Mr. KING. That high prices are the result of the so-called inflation of credits and currency, and the implication to be derived from the resolution that there is inflation as a result of the activities or lack of activities of the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. McCORMICK. I do not think the last will be found in the resolution. It is indisputable that not only in this country but in every country there has been a vast increment in the total of currency and credits. It is indisputable that there is a relation between the increment of currency and of credit and existing prices. The Senator surely recognizes that all the classic symptoms of impending financial crisis are manifest to-day. The principal hope of relief is in the Federal Reserve Board, and in the board advising the business world of steps proposed to meet the demand for credit when the period of crop moving comes.

While the distinguished Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] was still Secretary of the Treasury, the Reserve Board with his concurrence, and, if I am not mistaken, following his advice, raised the bank rate. Subsequently Congress legislated to vest in the Reserve Board and the member banks discretion as to the establishment of different rates.

Mr. GRONNA. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCORMICK. Certainly.

Mr. GRONNA. Will the Senator briefly outline what are the provisions of the resolution?

Mr. McCORMICK. The resolution calls upon the Reserve Board to inform the Senate what steps it contemplates taking to relieve the existing inflation and to mobilize credits against the time when we must move the crops of the country. The Senator very well remembers that in 1907, at this period in the year, there were manifest exactly the symptoms of economic and credit disorder which are present to-day, very much the same symptoms that were manifest in 1903. Unless under the reserve system the Reserve Board takes steps to forestall a credit stringency in the fall, we shall have something approximating a panic.

In my judgment, announcement at this time of the contemplated steps will serve a most valuable purpose in relieving the apprehension of thousands of creditors in the country. Such announcement will tend to meet the very stringency which is threatened in the fall.

Mr. GRONNA. May I ask the Senator if the resolution simply asks for information?

Mr. McCORMICK. It asks for nothing more.

Mr. GRONNA. I certainly have no objection to that. I think it is very advisable that we should adopt such a resolution.

Mr. McCORMICK. The resolution asks for nothing more than information; in fact, I may say to the Senator that to-day there are gathering in Washington representative bankers from all over the country to confer with the reserve board and the Secretary of the Treasury about the grave situation now impending.

Mr. GRONNA. I rose only for the purpose of securing information. The Senator knows, of course, as well as I do, the danger of changing the monetary laws by piecemeal. In reference to rates of interest and what they will do, I think any man who has studied political science from any angle at all knows that the men who will get the advantage of a high rate of interest, or the concerns which will get the benefit of a high rate of interest, are those which are making large profits. There is nothing which will harm the farming interests any more than to compel them to pay a high rate of interest. They will be obliged, if that be done, to cease operations, because their business does not pay a sufficient profit to enable them to pay high rates of interest.

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator from North Dakota will learn, if he will examine the resolution, that there is no reference to rates of interest. Unless steps are taken to-day to mobilize the necessary credit resources, farmers will be hard put to it to find money this fall when it is necessary for their very lives.

Mr. GRONNA. We know that the men who are now getting money are the automobile manufacturers and others who can place the burden upon the other party.

Mr. McCORMICK. Great amounts of credit are being utilized in the manufacture of silk stockings, phonographs, and all kinds of nonessentials.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President—

Mr. McCORMICK. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCORMICK. I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois why he has such an apprehension of a stringency in connection with the securing of money to handle the crops when grain receipts or warehouse receipts can be taken as security to the Federal reserve banks, deposited there, and any amount of money issued upon them and no interest charged upon that money for six months? If a warehouse receipt is good for the cash—and it certainly is if it covers wheat—why should there be the danger of inability to expand the currency when there is no interest charge for six months for such expansion?

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, we may continue to expand the currency, as we have expanded it, without checking the increase in interest rates, which has been manifest all this year.

Mr. McCORMICK. The increase of interest rates is due to the demand for money.

Mr. McCORMICK. Precisely.

Mr. McCORMICK. But the information I wanted to obtain from the Senator was the basis of his fear that we could not get sufficient money in the fall; in other words, that we could not sufficiently expand our currency to meet the requirements of moving the crops.

Mr. McCORMICK. Doubtless we can expand the currency while prices and interest rates increase indefinitely.

Mr. McCORMICK. Does the Senator from Illinois assume that we will fail to utilize the power in the present banking laws to meet the requirements incident to handling the crops?

Mr. McCORMICK. I assume nothing. I want to learn from the Federal Reserve Board what plan of relief, if any, it has in contemplation.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President—

Mr. McCORMICK. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. McLEAN. Under the law there is, of course, a limit to the expansion of the currency. That limit is the gold reserve which is required. When the reserves of the Federal reserve banks are exhausted, no more currency can be issued until the gold reserve is replenished.

Mr. KENYON. I desire to ask the Senator from Illinois, if I may, in connection with his resolution, to explain the rate of interest that is being charged by the reserve banks. What rate of interest are the Federal reserve banks charging?

Mr. McCORMICK. They are not charging a uniform rate of interest, as the Senator from Iowa knows.

Mr. KENYON. They are, I know, charging a very high rate of interest in some cases.

Mr. McCORMICK. They are seeking, I am told, to moderate activities in the production of nonessentials, or they are supposedly doing so.

Mr. KENYON. They have forced some particular banks to pay all the way from 10 to 13 per cent for money. That is reflected on the small banks and is reflected as to the farmer, and it is becoming a very serious situation in the sections of the country which the Senator and I represent.

Mr. McCORMICK. The resolution seeks for information as to the policy of the reserve board. That is what is most immediately necessary in the present situation.

Mr. KENYON. It never was intended, was it, that the reserve board should be engaged in building up banks or getting profits for banks? Its purpose was to serve a general public use.

Mr. SHEPHERD. Will the Senator welcome information as to whether they expect to earn 102 per cent on their capital stock next year?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, what is before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK].

Mr. BORAH. I do not desire to speak upon that if we can have it disposed of.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, can we not have a vote on the resolution?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution. The resolution was agreed to.

[From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 18, 1920, p. 7200.]

Mr. OWEN. * * * The resolution of the Senator from Illinois, however, offers a hook and an invitation from the Senate to the Federal Reserve Board to declare a policy of "deflation." It carries the suggestion of deflation. The policy of deflation set by the Wall Street stock exchange control, which broke the stock market by high interest rates, meets the approval of the same class of financial experts domiciled in Chicago, who might naturally advise the Senator from Illinois; but I warn the Federal Reserve Board and I warn the country that if a panic in this country results from their policy they are liable to have a North Dakota reaction, where a State bank was established to furnish money at fair and stable rates, using the credit of the State and the taxing power of the people of the State for that purpose. You can go too far in the matter of taxing the people of this country by high interest rates and the "deflation" of credit. If the Reserve Board leads the procession of banks in fixing high rates on the people—that is, on their own depositors—and a great industrial depression follows, why should they wonder if the people of this country should demand as a remedy that the reserve banks be made banks of deposit and discount? I warn the Federal Reserve Board that this country is not going to submit to any depression brought about by the banks of the country or under the policy of the board or under the advice of financiers domiciled either in New York or Chicago.

INFLATION OF CURRENCY AND MOBILIZATION OF CREDITS.

Letter from the governor of the Federal Reserve Board transmitting in response to a Senate resolution of May 17, 1920, certain information concerning the expansion of currency and the mobilization of credits to move crops of the year 1920.

(May 24 (calendar day, May 25), 1920.—Referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed.)

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD,
Washington, May 25, 1920.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

SIR: On May 17, 1920, the Senate adopted the following resolution: "Resolved, That the Federal Reserve Board be directed to advise the Senate what steps it purposes to take or to recommend to the member banks of the Federal reserve system to meet the existing inflation of currency and credits and consequent high prices, and what further steps it purposes to take or recommend to mobilize credits in order to move the 1920 crop."

In response the board desires to say that it has recognized for many months past that the expansion of bank credits in this country was proceeding at a rate not warranted by the production and consumption of goods. It has repeatedly admonished the Federal reserve banks that influence should be exerted upon the member banks to induce them to avoid undue expansion of loans and to keep their volume of outstanding credits within moderate bounds.

Beginning six months ago, the rates of discount on various classes of paper at the Federal reserve banks were advanced. During the latter part of January the present rates were put into effect. These advances, while undoubtedly checking credit transactions which otherwise would have been made, have not been entirely effective in bringing about the reduction in loans desired and which might normally have been expected during the early months of the year. Liquidation during these months is entirely natural and healthy, and is necessary in order that the banks may be prepared to meet the demands made upon them during the crop making and harvesting seasons, but there has been no such liquidation and, on the contrary, commercial loans have steadily increased. Thus it appears that the public has anticipated demands for banking credit which are usually made later on in the year. The average reserves of the Federal reserve banks are now a little over 42½ per cent as against 45 per cent at the beginning of the year and about 51 per cent 12 months ago.

The Federal advisory council, which is composed of one member from each Federal reserve district, elected annually by the board of directors of the Federal reserve bank, is required by section 12 of the Federal reserve act to meet in Washington at least four times each year. The council is authorized "to confer directly with the Federal Reserve Board on general business conditions; to make oral or written representations concerning matters within the jurisdiction of said board; to call for information and to make recommendations in regard to discount rates, rediscount business, note issues, reserve conditions in the various districts, the purchase and sale of gold or securities by reserve banks, open-market operations by said banks, and the general affairs of the reserve banking system."

Upon receipt of a notice that the council would hold its regular meeting on May 17, the board extended an invitation to the three class A directors of each Federal reserve bank, who are the representatives of the stockholding banks, to come to Washington at the same time for conference with the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal advisory council. This conference was held on the 18th instant, and it was developed at the meeting that the present credit expansion is due in great part to the abnormally high prices of goods and commodities now prevailing throughout the country and to the congestion of foodstuffs and essential raw materials at or near points of production because of lack of transportation facilities.

The board is convinced that if the unsold portions of last year's crops can be brought to market before the new crop matures, the liquidation of credits which are now tied up in carrying the old crops will be sufficient to offset to a considerable degree the credit demands which will be made upon the banks in moving the crop of 1920.

At the conference above referred to the board's views were outlined by its governor substantially as follows: The member banks should lean less heavily upon the Federal reserve banks and rely more upon their own resources, unnecessary and habitual borrowings should be discouraged, and the liquidation of long standing, nonessential loans should proceed. Banks were cautioned, however, that drastic steps should be avoided and that the methods adopted should be orderly, for gradual liquidation will result in permanent improvement while too rapid deflation would be injurious and should be avoided. The board pointed out the necessity for extending such credits as may be necessary to promote essential production, especially of foodstuffs, and that if for any reason it should prove impracticable to increase essential production, there should be greater economy in consumption and more moderation in the use of credit. The problem of the banking system of the country is to check further expansion and to bring about a normal and healthy liquidation without curtailing essential production and without shock to industry, and, as far as possible, without disturbance of legitimate commerce and business. In order to effect this it seems necessary to distinguish between essential and nonessential loans, but the Federal Reserve Board feels it would be a most difficult task, which it should not undertake, to attempt by general rule of country-wide application to make this distinction. During the war there was a broad underlying principle that essentials must be "necessary or contributory to the conduct of the war," but notwithstanding the sharp outline of this principle much difficulty was experienced by the various war boards in defining essentials and nonessentials. All the more difficult would it be for the Federal Reserve Board to make such a general definition in the present circumstances.

Section 13 of the Federal reserve act defines the eligibility of paper for discount by the Federal reserve banks and lays down a general rule that any paper maturing within the time prescribed and "issued or drawn for agricultural, industrial, or commercial purposes, or the proceeds of which have been used or are to be used for such purposes," is eligible. No expressed condition is made regarding the essential or nonessential character of the transactions giving rise to notes which may be offered for discount and the Federal Reserve Board is not required and properly could not be expected generally to adopt such a criterion of eligibility. It is too much a matter of local conditions and local knowledge to justify at this time any general country-wide ruling by the board even if such a ruling were deemed helpful.

On the other hand, there is nothing in the Federal reserve act which requires a Federal reserve bank to make any investment or to rediscount any particular paper or class of paper. The language of both sections 13 and 14 is permissive only. Section 4 of the Federal reserve act, however, requires the directors of a Federal reserve bank to administer its affairs "fairly and impartially and without discrimination in favor of or against any member bank," and subject to the provisions of law and the orders of the Federal Reserve Board to extend "to each member bank such discounts, advancements, and accommodations as may be safely and reasonably made with due regard for the claims and demands of other member banks." Thus the directors of a Federal reserve bank have the power to limit the volume and character of loans which in their judgment may be safely and reasonably made to any member bank.

The recent amendment to paragraph (d) of section 14 distinctly authorizes each Federal reserve bank on its own account, without reference to action taken by any other Federal reserve bank, to establish a normal discount or credit line for each member bank, and permits the imposition of graduated rates on discount lines in excess of the normal line. This amendment, however, does not repeal or modify sections 4 and 13, and a Federal reserve bank is still free to decline to discount any paper which in its judgment does not constitute a desirable investment for it or which in its opinion would not constitute a safe and reasonable investment within the meaning of section 4.

It is the view of the board, however, that while Federal reserve banks may properly undertake in their transactions with member banks to discriminate between essential and nonessential loans, nevertheless that discrimination might much better be made at the source by the member banks themselves. The individual banker comes in direct contact with his customers; he is better qualified than anyone else to advise the customer because of his familiarity not only with the customer's business but with the general business conditions and needs in his immediate locality. In making loans he is bound by no general rule of law as to the character of the purpose for which a loan is being asked. He is entirely free to exercise discretion, and can make one loan and decline another as his judgment may dictate. He can estimate with a fair degree of accuracy the legitimate demands for credit which are liable to be made upon him, as well as the fluctuations in the volume of his deposits. He knows what industries sustain his community, and is thus qualified to pass upon the essential or nonessential character of loans offered him. He knows, or should know, what rediscount line he may reasonably expect of his Federal reserve bank, and he ought not to regard this line as a permanent addition to his capital. With knowledge of the limitations or penalties put upon his borrowings from the Federal reserve bank, the banker may be depended upon to use a more discriminating judgment in granting credit accommodations to his customers, and that judgment he must exercise if the present situation is to be remedied fundamentally.

It is true that under existing conditions the volume of credit required in any transaction is much greater than was the case in pre-war times, but it is also true that the resources of the member and nonmember banks would be ample to take care of the essential business of the country and to a large extent of nonessentials as well if there were a freer flow of goods and credit. If "frozen loans" were liquidated and if commodities which are held back either for speculative purposes or because of lack of transportation facilities should go to the markets and if large stock of merchandise should be reduced, the resultant release of credit would have a most beneficial effect upon the general situation. In the meantime everything must be done to expedite the release of these credits and to restrict nonessential credits in future.

While the problem of credit regulation and control is national and even international in its scope, yet in the last analysis it is merely an aggregation of individual problems, and the proper working out of the situation must depend upon the public and upon the banks which deal with the public. The public must be made to realize the necessity of economy in expenditures and in consequent demands for banking credit. The banks themselves are best able to impress the importance of this policy upon the public.

For the further information of the Senate the board quotes from the report of the Federal advisory council made to it on May 18, signed by James B. Forgan, president:

"The council has given consideration to the matters included in your communication of April 17 and begs to reply thereto in the following manner, following the order set out by you:

"(a) 'Causes of continued expansion of credits and of Federal note issues.'

"There are many contributing causes, of which the following may be regarded as paramount:

- "1. We recognize, of course, that the first cause is the Great War.
- "2. Great extravagance—national, municipal, and individual.
- "3. Inefficiency and indifference of labor, resulting in lessening production.
- "4. A shortage of transportation facilities, thus preventing the normal movement of commodities.
- "5. The vicious circle of increasing wages and prices.

"(b) 'How can the reserve position of the Federal reserve banks be materially strengthened before the seasonal demand sets in next fall without undue disturbance of the processes of production and distribution?'

"By urging upon member banks through the Federal reserve banks the wisdom of showing borrowers the necessity of the curtailment of general credits, and especially for nonessential uses, as well as continuing to discourage loans for capital and speculative purposes, by checking excessive borrowings through the application of higher rates.

"(c) 'If steps can not be taken at this time leading to a more normal proportion between the volume of credits and the volume of goods, when can they be taken?'

"In our opinion steps should be taken now, as outlined in answer to the last question.

"(d) 'What is the effect upon the general situation of the increased Treasury borrowings and what should be the policy of the Federal reserve banks in establishing rates of discount on paper secured by certificates of indebtedness?'

"It is obvious that the borrowings of the Treasury have the same effect upon the general credit situation as those of other borrowers. The council would suggest the wisdom of congressional relief from the burden of Government financing by a policy of rigid economy; the revision of the tax laws for the sake of a more equitable distribution of the burden without reducing the revenue; the enactment of the Budget system, the Budget to include provision for the gradual payment of the short-time obligations of the Treasury. These would of necessity preclude unwise appropriations, such as the proposed soldiers' bonus.

"In view of the large volume of Treasury certificates of indebtedness carried by member banks at the instance of the Treasury Department, we believe that rates established by the Federal reserve banks on paper secured by them should not be materially greater than the rates borne by the certificates."

The board feels assured that the banks of the country now realize the necessity of more conservatism in extending credits and of a reasonable reduction in the volume of credits now outstanding. The board will not hesitate, so far as it may be necessary, to bring to bear all its statutory powers in regulating the volume of credit, but wishes to point out that the more vital problems relating to the movement of the 1920 crop are physical rather than financial.

This was the unanimous view of those present at the conference on the 18th instant, at which the following resolution was adopted:

"The whole country is suffering from inflation of prices, with the consequent inflation of credit. From reports made by the members of this conference, representing every section of the country, it is obvious that great sums are tied up in products which if marketed would relieve necessity, tend to reduce the price level, and relieve the strain on our credit system.

"This congestion of freight is found in practically all of the large railroad centers and shipping ports. It arises chiefly from inadequate transportation facilities available at this time and is seriously crippling business. We are informed that the per ton-mile of freight increased in three years—1916, 1917, and 1918—47 per cent, while the freight cars in service during the same period decreased 1.9 per cent.

"A striking necessity exists which can only be relieved through the upbuilding of the credit of the railroads. This must come through adequate and prompt increase in freight rates. Any delay means the paying of greater cost directly and indirectly, and places a burden on the credit system which in the approaching time for season expansion may cause abnormal strain. Even under the load of war inflation, high-price level, and extravagances the bank reserves would probably be sufficient if quick transportation could be assured during the time of the greatest strain: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That this conference urge as the most important remedies that the Interstate Commerce Commission and the United States Shipping Board give increased rates and adequate facilities such immediate effect as may be warranted under their authority, and that a committee of five, representing the various sections of the country, be appointed by the chairman to present this resolution to the Interstate Commerce Commission and the United States Shipping Board with such verbal presentation as may seem appropriate to the committee."

Much will depend upon the restoration of the normal efficiency of railroad and steamship lines. If adequate transportation facilities can be provided, the board sees no occasion for apprehension in connection with the movement of crops now being grown.

Respectfully,

W. P. G. HARDING, Governor.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I do not feel that it is at all incumbent upon me to take any notice of what has been said by the Senator from Alabama beyond his personal references to me.

I can appreciate the Senator's point of view and his feeling in the premises. If no one has thought enough of his speech to circulate it, I have nothing to do with that. If anyone else thought enough of my speech to circulate it, naturally I feel gratified at that.

I simply objected to the Senator's rather offensive statement that I had been induced by somebody to make my speech. The speech speaks for itself. It was made without prompting or request from any source. It was intended to express my indignation at the constant assaults upon a great banking institution of this country, and I hope it was effectually done.

I have not asked a human being to circulate a copy of the speech. I have had innumerable requests for it, one this morning from a prominent citizen of Alabama, asking me where he could obtain enough copies to put the speech into the hands of every voter in that State. I am not interested to do that. If anyone else is interested to order copies of the speech through me, I shall be very glad to order them for him.

That is all there is to it, Mr. President.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, since that announcement from the Senator from Virginia, the friends of the Federal Reserve Board will know how and where to procure copies of his speech. He has assured us that he will be glad to order them for them. I will have one in the Record in a day or two, when I get a chance to finish revising it, which I will send at my own expense to the bankers of my State, because I am forced to do so by the sending of the Senator's speech into my State. It would cost me many hundreds of dollars to put it in pamphlet form and circulate it generally, as it is a long speech. The Federal Reserve Board may circulate some other Senator's speech, but not mine. I will circulate my own speeches and I am not inviting anybody to have my speeches printed and circulated. This great banking system, I repeat, operating under a law which I helped to pass, and which the whole people have a right to demand shall be kept true to its original purpose and high mission, must not become the handy instrument of those whose evil practices it was intended to prevent or destroy.

I have had requests for many copies of my speech from distinguished residents of the State of the Senator from Virginia, and I have a letter from the former Comptroller of the Treasury, John Skelton Williams, a man of unimpeachable integrity, a man of great courage, a man of great ability, who was Comptroller of the Currency for eight years under President Wilson. He was the member of the board who first called attention to the fact that this board had gone wrong with the administration of the Federal reserve system; and John Skelton Williams is a friend of the system. He is the man who told them that instead of contracting the currency they could issue $2,000,000,000 and save the situation, rather than put out and speed the processes of destruction. He is the man to whom I am now referring, and he wrote me a letter in which he commended my work in this matter, and he said that I was rendering a good service to the whole country, and he added, "God bless you in the splendid work that you are doing."

I appreciate that letter, Mr. President, coming from a man who never has bowed his knee to Baal. No interest in the country could make John Skelton Williams turn against truth and justice. I do not care whether it be the desire for political life or for any other thing, you could not move him. He is as honest as Paul and as firm as the Rock of Ages. None of his statements about the Federal Reserve Board's conduct have ever been disproven. I am fighting the battle of two and a half million people in Alabama, the whole people of the South, and the people of the West. I am one doing my very best to be of service to them and to show them the truth. I have dared to diagnose the case in question from the testimony of Gov. Harding and from that of his "gold-dust twin," Mr. Platt, from the bulletins of the Federal Reserve Board, from the able editorials in the Manufacturers' Record, from the "Crime of 1920," by George Washington Armstrong, of Fort Worth, Tex., and from the Supreme Court decision, and I was convinced that the Federal Reserve Board had maladministered and perverted this system from the ends of its institution. It is my duty to tell what I think the trouble is and who is responsible for the trouble.

Mr. President, the doctor who goes in to see a patient who is sick nigh unto death and tells his loved ones that they are responsible for his condition because they did not properly prepare his food, and that he is near death's door because they did not do the right thing, when that doctor knows that the man has had poison administered to him from an outside source that wanted to get rid of him, is a contemptible wretch.

Mr. President, I have never studied one question in all my life as I have studied this question for 18 months and more, and when I read the bulletins of the board itself, the statements of John Skelton Williams, the statements of Gov. Harding, and the market statements about the effect of deflation upon the market, I knew what it was that wrought ruin in the country, and I have dared to speak my convictions in the matter. Should I have gone to the distressed farmer and said, "You did it; you are the cause of it; you made too much cotton, and so forth," he would have replied, "Why, I didn't make as much as I did the year before."

"You made too much corn. You made too much wheat." He would say, with his head hanging down, despondent, "The Federal Reserve Board told us that we would have prosperity for five years after the war; to go to it; that Europe was starving and there would be a good price for all we made, and we went out and cultivated the soil and produced the crop, and here we are in the market place, and my cotton, which was worth $200 a bale, is now worth $50 a bale." With the gloom clouds of despondency hanging low about his head the farmer said, "What am I to do? What is the cause of this? Who did this thing to me?"

I said, "Can you not go to the bank and take your warehouse receipt and get money?"

He said, "No; I have already been down there."

"What did the banker say to you?"

"He said that they had loaned all the money they had. They already had loans on cotton."

I said, "Why can you not get more money through the Federal reserve banking system?"

He said, "We can not get it. We have tried it, and they say they will not loan any more money on cotton for the purpose of holding it for a better price."

What happened? He had to sell it for $50 a bale, threw it upon a dead market, sacrificed it, and the debt-paying power, or $150 of it, had been killed outright by that deflation policy.

Then do they expect me to stand here and abuse my own self-respect and violate my own duty to the truth and say that the farmer did this awful thing? It is not true. The policy of deflation did it.

What happened in 1919? They started to breaking the price. The farmers moved up to this great banking system and said, "Here are our warehouse receipts. We want money." The banker said, "All right; yes, sir," and just counted out the crisp bills—$20, $50, $100 bills—and handed them out to the farmer, and what did he do? He went over to the merchant and he said, "I owe you, and I know you have to carry on your business, and I do not want to sell my cotton. I want to keep it off the market until the price will cover the cost of production plus a profit, and I am going to pay you." He goes to another one and another one, and he holds his cotton off the market and the spinner can not get it, and the speculator meets a warrior in the open who fights him, and he can not beat the price down, because the speculator says, "You had better stay off that bear side. The bulls are backing these fellows. They can get money on your cotton, and when they can you can not drive it down so low."

What happens? He holds that cotton and the demand comes for it strong. He said, "No; that will not cover the cost of production." The price goes up and up and it gets up to where it will cover the cost of production plus a profit, and he says, "All right. I am ready to sell," and he was enabled because he could obtain money and credits to save his business from ruin.

Then what happened? The merchant owed the money to the bank, and the same bank that let the farmer have the money two hours before got it back from the merchant. It was not out in that circle two hours, and it went right back to the bank.

What happened in 1920? The price came down and down. The farmer said, "I declare, this situation is terrible. I will go to the bank. I must have some money."

The banker said, "We are tied right up with loans. We have tried the Federal reserve banks, and we can not get money to loan on cotton."

"Why?"

"They say do not loan money on products that are intended to be held for speculative purposes."

He said, "Of course, that is a speculative purpose. If the price is below the cost of production and I want to hold it so that the price will cover the cost of production, that is speculation, in a sense, but it is honest speculation. It is a speculation that is just and right, and the Government ought to help me to do that." He insists that he be helped for that purpose. But the local bank says, "Not only are they refusing to loan, but they are demanding that we collect that which you already owe us."

He said, "If you do that, you will throw on the market the cotton you already have tied up in loans and I will have to throw mine on the market. All this cotton thrown on the market will bring the price still lower." And that is what happened, and it went down and down, and the banking system, under this reserve board, which enabled us to fight and win the fight in 1919, deserted us in 1920 and refused to give us the same kind of aid.

Mr. President, one other word. Every time the farmer lost $5 on a bale of cotton, the gambling speculators of New York made it. They were on the bear side selling cotton futures. If cotton was 20 cents and a bear speculator went upon the exchange and sold a bale of cotton and the next day it was down to 19 cents, the farmer had lost that $5 a bale and the speculator had made it. When it went to 18 he had made $10 and the farmer had lost $10, and so on down the line. One other thing in this connection: Ex-Gov. Bickett, of North Carolina, testified before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. He said the trouble was the call came all down the line to liquidate, to pay up, to call loans. "Where did that call come from, Governor?" "The bankers of North Carolina said it came from the Federal Reserve Board." That was in the fall of 1920.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have no disposition to take part in the controversy between the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. That is not my purpose in taking the floor. Yet there is one phase that has come out of the controversy of which it seems to me the Senate ought to take notice, and I hope I can speak of that without anyone getting the idea that I am undertaking to participate in the controversy or to find fault with either one of the Senators to whom I have referred.

I have listened to the Senator from Alabama. I listened to him at the time he made the speech to which the Senator from Virginia replied. I listened to the Senator from Virginia and heard him offer his reply. My own judgment is that both of the speeches are worthy of publication and distribution, and I am not finding any fault with any citizen or any official or any person who distributes either one or both of them. I do not agree with the Senator from Virginia in all of the things he said in his very able and eloquent speech, and yet I think everyone who listened to it and heard it will concede that it was a very able presentation of the question from his viewpoint and is entitled to honest consideration and is worthy of distribution either in Alabama or in any other place.

But it seems, Mr. President, from a letter which the Senator from Alabama has read, that the Federal reserve bank at Atlanta circulated that speech and then wrote a letter, presumably to each banker or at least to each bank in the Federal reserve system, at least in the State of Alabama, calling attention in the letter to the fact that they had sent this speech and asking the banker to write them and give his opinion of the speech. Now, if that be true; if that information is correct and that was done by the Federal reserve bank at Atlanta, writing to bankers who when they want a favor or to borrow money must come to this same bank, it seems to me that some of the officials responsible for that kind of procedure ought at least to be removed from office. If the officials of the Federal reserve bank at Atlanta are moved in their action or, directly or indirectly, directed by any of the officials of the Federal Reserve Board in Washington, then the removal ought to come to men who are higher up, and the members of the Federal Reserve Board, if they are responsible for it, should be removed.

It must be remembered that when the Federal reserve bank or their officials send out something of that kind where they themselves are being criticized, where their conduct of an official position is the subject of dispute, and then write to the men composing that system, first telling them what they have done, and asking for their judgment, they are going to men who may be in a position where they must go for help to the very men who are above them. It seems to me that kind of conduct, regardless of the merits of the proposition, is reprehensible and ought not to be passed by in silence. If the Federal Reserve Board or the Federal reserve bank are to use wrongfully the great power that is in their hands, it becomes an instrumentality of oppression and coercion. Nothing can be worse for the good of our country, for the welfare of our people, than to have those who control the purse strings of the Nation draw those purse strings upon people who come to them for financial favors and who must come to them for financial favors and who can go nowhere else.

If the Federal reserve system is to be used for that purpose, and if there is no way to stop it, the law creating it ought to be wiped off the statute books, because certainly that kind of power over the banks of the country which will control the loaning and the borrowing of the money of the banks of the country—that kind of power, if wrongfully used, will bring on the most deplorable condition imaginable.

I repeat, without in any way taking sides in the controversy, without even expressing an opinion as to the merits of the controversy, it seems to me that the Senator from Alabama, in the reading of that letter, has presented something to the Senate which it can not afford to pass by and which it ought to investigate. If the evidence shows what that letter indicates it would show, then there are some officials in the Government who at the very least must be removed from office.

RETIREMENT OF DISABLED ARMY OFFICERS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1565) making eligible for retirement under the same conditions as now provided for officers of the Regular Army all officers of the United States Army during the World War who have incurred physical disability in line of duty.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask to have inserted in the RECORD two rather brief telegrams, which are mere examples of telegrams and letters I have been receiving on the subject of the bill now before the Senate. I would not undertake to offer all such telegrams and letters, but these are, as I said, illustrative of the views contained in the many telegrams on the subject which have come to me on this subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LADD in the chair). Without objection the telegrams will be printed in the RECORD as requested.

The telegrams are as follows:

BALTIMORE, MD., February 16, 1922.

Senator D. U. FLETCHER,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

We learn from CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of yesterday that the Bursum bill (S. 1565) is to be considered on the floor of the Senate to-day. The Maryland Chapter of the Disabled Emergency Officers of the World War respectfully request your active support and vote on this measure.

Lieut. J. W. DEWEY, State Secretary.

CINCINNATI, OHIO, February 17, 1922.

DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

Understand Bursum bill for relief disabled emergency Army officers up to-day. There is pressing need that it be passed just as soon as possible, as they are dying in considerable numbers. What we are asking is less than now given Regular Army, Navy, and Marine officers, and emergency Navy and Marines. Ours are the only officers being denied the relief. Hope your conviction will lead you to assist Senator Bursum on the floor.

VICTOR HEINTZ.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I believe the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BURSUM] proposes to discuss the unfinished business. I regard it as a measure of very great importance. It is worthy of the attention and very serious and earnest consideration of the Senate and there ought to be more Senators present than we have in the Chamber at this time to hear what the Senator has to say. Therefore I suggest the absence of a quorum in order that we may have a better attendance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brandegge	Heffin	Moses	Simmons
Bursum	Jones, N. Mex.	New	Smith
Capper	Jones, Wash.	Newberry	Stanfield
Caraway	Kellogg	Norris	Stranmill
Colt	Kendrick	Overman	Underwood
Cummins	Ladd	Page	Wadsworth
Dial	Lodge	Pittman	Walsh, Mass.
Edge	McCormick	Polindexter	Warren
Ernst	McKellar	Ransdell	Watson, Ga.
Fletcher	McKinley	Robinson	Willis
Harris	McNary	Sheppard

Mr. JONES of Washington. I was requested to announce that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], and the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] are detained at a hearing before the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-three Senators having answered to their names. A quorum is not present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The reading clerk called the names of the absent Senators, and the following Senators answered to their names when called:

Johnson Reed Spencer

The following Senators entered the Chamber and answered to their names:

Ball France Nelson Phipps
Cameron Gooding

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President, I desire to read into the RECORD a number of resolutions which have been received indorsing the pending measure. I desire to read first a communication from the Colonial Dames of the State of New York dated December 9, 1921, which is as follows:

THE COLONIAL DAMES OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK, 541 Madison Avenue, December 9, 1921.

Hon. JOHN F. CAREW,
House of Representatives Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: At a meeting of the board of managers of the Colonial Dames of the State of New York held on December 6, 1921, I was instructed to notify you that the Colonial Dames of this State are strongly in favor of the Bursum bill, Senate 1565, now before Congress, and I was asked to request you to use every effort to secure its passage.

Yours, very truly,

PHEBE K. THORNE, Recording Secretary.

I desire to read into the RECORD a resolution adopted by the Veterans of Foreign Wars. It is contained in the following letter addressed to me:

NATIONAL LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE,
VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., September 27, 1921.

The Hon. HOLM O. BURSUM,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In compliance with the provision in the resolution itself, I am transmitting the following to you, which is the resolution passed at the Twenty-second Annual Convention of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States on September 24, 1921, at Detroit, Mich.:

"Whereas there has been introduced in the United States Senate a bill, known as the Bursum bill, Senate bill 1565, calendar No. 228, which has for its purposes 'the making eligible for retirement under certain conditions officers of the United States Army, other than officers of the Regular Army, who incurred physical disability in the line of duty while in the service of the United States during the war'; and

"Whereas this bill has been favorably reported to the Senate with amendments acceptable to the disabled emergency officers of the World War; and

"Whereas this bill is one of equity and pure justice to a disabled class of our comrades in service, who are entitled because of their wounds and disabilities received in battle and in line of their duty and service to the same consideration and privileges as men of their rank who did the same service but were of the Regular Establishment.

"Therefore the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States in encampment assembled at Detroit, Mich., September, 1921, do heartily indorse the above-mentioned Senate bill No. 1565, and do further petition the Congress to pass it at an early date, and to this end we urge that the Senate at this time make it the 'unfinished business' as soon as possible.

"That copies of this resolution be spread at large upon our minutes and copies sent to Senator BURSUM for his information, to Senators LENROOF and SMOOT urging their support of the measure, to the disabled emergency officers of the World War."

Very truly, yours,

EDWIN S. BETTELHEIM, Jr.,
Chairman.

I also read into the RECORD a resolution adopted by the Union League Club, of Chicago, under date of January 23, 1922, as follows:

UNION LEAGUE CLUB,
Chicago, January 23, 1922.

Hon. H. O. BURSUM,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The following resolution has just been forwarded to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs:

"The Union League Club, of Chicago, through its public affairs committee, desires to express its approval of Senate bill No. 1565, introduced by Senator BURSUM May 4, 1921, and now before the Committee on Military Affairs.

"This bill makes eligible for retirement all officers, including emergency officers, of the United States Army who have incurred physical disability in line of duty in the recent World War, with the same conditions and privileges as are now provided for officers of the Regular Army.

"It further provides that pay and allowances shall come solely out of the military and naval compensation appropriation fund of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance.

"The club believes that there should not be any discrimination against emergency officers and that the passage of the Bursum bill will properly place on a parity all men who have incurred physical disability in line of duty.

"Such a policy will be in harmony with the true intent and purpose of the selective service act of May 18, 1917, and should be enacted into law in accordance with the provisions of the Bursum bill."

Very truly, yours,

GEO. I. BUCKINGHAM, President.

I read into the RECORD a communication from the United Spanish War Veterans dated Washington, D. C., February 17, 1922, as follows:

HEADQUARTERS NATIONAL LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE,
UNITED SPANISH WAR VETERANS,
Washington, D. C., February 17, 1922.

Hon. HOLM O. BURSUM,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: On behalf of the United States Spanish War Veterans, I am taking the liberty of writing to urge your active support of Senate bill 1565, providing for the retirement of disabled emergency officers.

We believe this is a just measure and that such emergency officers should be granted the protection of the measure. All veteran organizations are heartily in favor of its passage.

We trust that you may deem it proper to support the bill.

Very truly, yours,

JNO. LEWIS SMITH, Chairman.

I read into the RECORD a resolution adopted by the American Legion in convention assembled November 22, 1921, as follows:

THE AMERICAN LEGION,
NATIONAL LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE,
Washington, D. C., November 22, 1921.

Hon. H. O. BURSUM,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR BURSUM: The recent convention of the American Legion held at Kansas City, Mo., adopted the following resolutions regarding disabled emergency officers:

"Whereas the disabled emergency officers of the Army are not receiving the same treatment as the other five classes of disabled officers who served during the World War, in that they are denied the privileges of retirement for physical disability as allowed all other disabled officers, regular and emergency alike; and

"Whereas it is obviously unjust and discriminatory to deny to one class of disabled officers the rights and privileges accorded all other classes; and

"Whereas there is pending in Congress now legislation to correct this discrimination: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the American Legion take steps to urge upon Congress the passage of this legislation at the earliest possible date, to the end that the disabled emergency officers may receive the treatment to which they are entitled."

The American Legion's Auxiliary, comprised of some 300,000 women, passed the same resolution at their first national convention held in Kansas City, Mo., recently.

This for your information.

Sincerely, yours,

JOHN THOMAS TAYLOR,
Vice Chairman National Legislative Committee.

Mr. President, I desire also to read into the RECORD a telegram dated McMinnville, Oreg., February 18, and addressed to Hon. C. L. McNARY, United States Senator, which reads as follows:

McMINNVILLE, OREG., February 18, 1922.

Hon. C. L. McNARY,
United States Senator, Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.:

Oregon Department, American Legion, urges your support of Bursum bill for retirement disabled emergency Army officers. This bill being fought by War Department. Legion is vitally interested in this legislation in favor disabled. It is time for Government to perform rather than promise. There have been too many promises and little performance.

WALTER L. TOOTZ, JR.,
Chairman Legislative Committee.

I desire further to read into the RECORD a telegram dated Eugene, Oreg., February 17, 1922, addressed to Hon. CHARLES L. McNARY, Washington, D. C., as follows:

EUGENE, OREG., February 17, 1922.

Senator CHARLES L. McNARY,
Washington, D. C.:

Request your active support of Bursum bill coming up to-day.

BEN F. DORRIS.

I also read into the RECORD a telegram, received at this moment, addressed to myself, as follows:

NEW YORK, N. Y., February 20, 1922.

Senator BURSUM,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

It is with sincere pleasure and gratitude that I write this wire to you and those other United States Senators whose patriotism is of a kind which believes, even though the war be over, that to accord justice is of greater moment than to please those who would attempt to save a few dollars in taxes for those who profited greatly in money when the emergency officer was giving up blood. As a disabled emergency officer, 50 per cent permanent disability, who commanded Company E, Twenty-third United States Infantry, and served only with Regular troops, I extend to you my sincere thanks and congratulations. Let not your opponents think that the expense of this wire denotes financial opulence. It means no lunches for several days.

GRANT SHEPHERD.

Mr. President, Senate bill 1565 provides for the retirement of emergency officers who were disabled to the extent of 30 per cent permanent rating upon the same basis as those who served in the Regular Army. This bill also provides that those officers who may have a rating of less than 30 per cent and more than 10 per cent may also be retired on application, but without pay. In other words, the retirement of officers under 30 per cent and over 10 per cent will be made, but without any retirement pay.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. BURSUM. I yield.

Mr. SPENCER. Does that give to those officers anything except the title to which they are entitled, without any of the prerequisites of pay or emoluments incident to ordinary retirement?

Mr. BURSUM. It gives them simply the honor of being retired. It further gives them the privilege of hospitalization and the right and privilege of purchasing supplies from the Government commissaries on the same basis as any other retired officer of the Regular Army.

Mr. SPENCER. But no retirement compensation?

Mr. BURSUM. No retirement compensation, and no emoluments whatever. The bill very plainly states that they will be entitled to the compensation which they would otherwise have been entitled to, but none whatever by virtue of being retired.

Mr. SPENCER. And the Senator means, by "which they would otherwise have been entitled to," the regular compensation under the compensation acts of Congress?

Mr. BURSUM. Under the compensation acts—the compensation which they may be entitled to now, which they may now be receiving. In other words, the fact of their being retired below 30 per cent and above 10 per cent will not deprive them of their existing rights; but they do not, by virtue of the retirement, receive a single penny from the Treasury of the United States.

Some objection has been made to this bill on the ground that it might lead to extravagant expenditures later on; that the retirement roll might grow. Mr. President, I submit that under the limitations of this act there would be no chance for such a thing to occur. However, the Congress a few years ago passed a bill granting retirement privileges to the emergency officers of the Navy and the Marines, the provisional officers who retired under conditions similar to those provided in this bill, except that the disability under the pending bill is much greater than it was under the authority which was given by Congress for the retirement of emergency or provisional officers of the Marines and of the Navy. That bill was repealed a short time ago. It was in force, I think, something over a year—nearly two years. Those who were entitled to be retired were retired. The law in itself could no longer have served any special use, as I think nearly all of those who were entitled to retirement secured retirement under that act, and Congress repealed it a short time ago.

In view of that precedent, I had thought to modify this bill so as to limit the time for application to one year after the passage of this bill. That would safeguard any possible objections that the most critical opponents of the bill could set up.

I therefore ask, Mr. President, that the following amendment be made:

First, amend the bill by substituting "Veterans' Bureau" for "Bureau of War Risk Insurance" wherever that expression appears in the bill. That is for the purpose of conforming to the title which was given to the Veterans' Bureau during the present Congress, and the change of legislation.

Second, add at the end of the bill the following:

No person shall be entitled to benefits under the provisions of this act except he make application as hereinbefore provided within 12 months after the passage of this act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator desire to have the amendments considered at this time?

Mr. BURSUM. It is my bill, and I suppose I have a right to accept the amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be stated.

The READING CLERK. Wherever the words "Bureau of War Risk Insurance" occur in the bill, it is proposed to change them to "Veterans' Bureau."

Also, it is proposed to add, at the end of the proposed committee amendment, the following:

No person shall be entitled to benefits under the provisions of this act except he make application as hereinbefore provided within 12 months after the passage of this act.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I could not hear the amendments. Is the Senator going to press his bill to a vote now?

Mr. BURSUM. No; I will explain the amendments to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. We do not want them adopted now. Is the Senator asking for their adoption now?

Mr. BURSUM. Yes; I was. All that the amendments cover is this: One of them limits the benefits arising under this bill to those persons who make application within 12 months after the passage of the bill. The other amendment is simply technical, to change the name of the bureau to conform to the law.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I see. I do not suppose there is any necessity of having any more Members here for the adoption of those amendments.

Mr. BURSUM. The principal amendment simply restricts the benefits of the act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendments will be agreed to.

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President, among other things, the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], on the floor of the Senate during the debate on this bill, said:

I have never liked using the retired list of the Regular Army or the Regular Navy as a device for paying additional sums of money to persons outside of those services. The retired list of the Army and of the Navy was not created to be a vehicle for the relief of persons outside of those two permanent services, and it has never been so used. It has been kept inviolate. It was established generations ago on a well-defined and well-accepted theory.

Later, in the course of debate upon the pending business, the senior Senator from New York, among other things, made the following statement:

But, Mr. President, reverting again to the policy of the country with respect to the treatment of its officers and soldiers raised to meet emergencies in former wars and in the World War, this bill constitutes the first attempt on the part of Congress, if it is to be passed, of drawing a line of demarcation in the matter of pensions or compensation to the injured between enlisted men and officers.

Further on in the debate the senior Senator from New York, in answer to a statement made by the junior Senator from Missouri, made the following statement:

I am not contending that the emergency officer should not receive as good treatment financially as the Regular officer, but I do draw a distinction between the different grades or ranks of emergency officers which I would not draw in the case of Regulars.

In answer to these propositions, Mr. President, I submit that the disabled emergency officers are asking for no relief, as the interpretation of that word implies; they are not asking alms or charity. They are asking for justice, for equality, for the rights to which, under all of the rules of fair dealing, they are entitled. They are asking for relief against what seems to me to be a violent discrimination against the disabled officer who served as such in the Army of the United States and was disabled in line of duty.

The senior Senator from New York has admitted on the floor of the Senate that he does not contend that the emergency officer should not receive as good treatment financially as the Regular officer. If that be true, why the objections to this bill? If this were done, of necessity these disabled officers would be carried upon some roll in some form. Can it be possible that the objection is made solely upon the ground that the names of these emergency officers, who have performed such splendid service in behalf of this country, are to be placed on the retirement roll? Is that the basis of opposition to the passage of the bill? If this be the case, Mr. President, I can not understand the purpose, unless it be to establish firmly the policy of maintaining an exclusive roll of the defenders of our country who happen to have belonged to the so-called Regular Army.

I hope this is not the case. There is already prevailing throughout the country a general belief that the spirit of the Regular Army is not friendly to the officer who came from civil life.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. BURSUM. Yes.

Mr. RANSDELL. I should like to ask the Senator to tell us, if he will, whether or not the discrimination of which he complains, when applied to the officers of the emergency army, as compared with those of the Regular Army, also applies when the private soldiers, the enlisted men of the emergency army, are compared with the private soldiers of the Regular Army?

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President, it does not apply. With the same service and under like conditions there is equal treatment; there is no difference.

Mr. RANSDELL. I understand the Senator, then, to say that a private soldier who enlisted in the emergency army is, under like conditions and circumstances, treated in exactly the same way as a private soldier in the Regular Army?

Mr. BURSUM. Absolutely.

Mr. RANSDELL. Then, unless the Senator's bill is passed we would have one rule for the private soldier and another rule for the officer in the emergency army?

Mr. BURSUM. That is true. That is the reason for the introduction of this bill. That is the cause of the petition on behalf of these disabled officers, to obtain from Congress what the country believes to be a square and fair deal, to obtain justice.

There is already, as I stated a few moments ago, prevailing throughout the country a general belief that the spirit of the Regular Army is not friendly to the officer who came from civil life. I do not make this statement with any unfriendly feeling toward our Regular Army. I am proud of that Army. I want to see it continue to be a useful and forceful branch of this Government as an element upon which we may rely as a basis for the mobilization of necessary military forces in periods of peril and need. I am not opposed to the officers who have come from West Point or Annapolis. These institutions have made valuable contributions to the world. Great achievements have been accomplished by officers who were trained at one or the other of these institutions.

They gave us such men as Grant, and Lee, and Farragut, and Taylor, and Scott; but, Mr. President, after all, the great potential fighting force of this country in time of peril is found in the ranks of the civilians. With all of our facilities for training, it was found in the World War that the Regular Establishment of the Army could not furnish 10 per cent of the officers necessary to conduct that war. The country in time of need is dependent upon the patriotic civilian population to produce capable officers to fill the requirements caused by the pending emergency. In order to do this, of necessity a vast amount of educational and military training must be conducted independently and at private expense in order to meet great emergencies which come to great nations. That is done, and has always been done, as a measure of preparedness inspired through love of country and a spirit of patriotism. No one believes in the maintenance of a large standing army, and I think we all agree that whatever its size it should be the best army that American genius can devise. I think we may all agree that we must rely upon the civilian population to constitute the great bulwark of our defense. Mr. President, it is all very nice to talk about the loyalty and patriotism of those who sacrificed themselves for the preservation of the country, but we should not forget, Mr. President, that the average man who serves his country has other obligations which are near and dear to him. When he enters the service in time of war he knows he may never return; he may be killed; he may be wounded; he may be crippled for life; he may be so incapacitated that he will no longer be in condition to take care of those who are dependent upon him. If he knows that the Government will take care of his widow or orphan, if he knows that if he is wounded or disabled to such extent as to render him incapable of fulfilling his dearest and nearest obligations, such a provision as I am urging will go a long way toward perpetuating a universal spirit of loyalty in time of need.

In other words, Mr. President, the measure of loyalty throughout the country, generally speaking, will be largely governed by the measure of appreciation extended by the Government. The American people are strong for a fair deal—a square deal; discrimination is an abominable word to the average American. When it comes to service in time of war, or any other time for that matter, we should have no favorite classes within a class. These emergency officers did not obtain their commissions as a mere matter of chance. It did not simply happen, as has been suggested by the senior Senator from New York. These emergency officers were put to the test before they were given commissions. They were sent to the training camps; they were examined as to their mental capacity; they were examined, tried, and trained as to every requisite essential to constitute a capable officer fit to command the particular unit for which he was commissioned. They were not accidents. And, Mr. President, as to the proposition that retirement privilege is only given to the Regular Army officer because he has made this his life work, that appeals to me as the sheerest nonsense.

The only difference between the Regular Army officer and the emergency officer in respect to education is that the emergency officer has educated himself at his own expense. He may have put in a large portion of his life training with the National Guard at his own expense and without compensation. He may have been trained at a military college at his own expense; at any rate, he was able to stand the test of the Regular Army experts without having been any expense to the Government, except those incurred in the training camps, which, of course, was only for a few months, while, on the other hand, the Regular Army officer has been educated at Government expense. The obligation is all with the Government. If the officer continues in service during his life, it is because he so chooses; there is nothing to prevent an Army officer from tendering his resignation, or the President from accepting the same. The truth of the matter is these places are sought for all over the country. Members of the House and of the Senate are continually receiving applications for appointments to West Point. That is natural; it is a chance to secure a free education and a permanent position for life. But, Mr. President, I can not see why that should be held a good reason to discriminate against the emergency officer. There is no contention that the pending bill will give to the emergency officer a single benefit which is not given to the Regular Army—the identical service, the identical compensation, under identical conditions. The retirement law has, as I understand it, three distinct and separate considerations:

First. The basis is length of service.

Second. The basis is age—that is to say, that when an Army officer reaches the age of 64 he must be retired.

Third. Disability which renders him unfit for service, incurred in line of duty.

The last proposition is the one the benefit of which this bill attempts to extend to the emergency officer.

The principle involved, with reference to retirement on account of disability incurred through injury in line of duty, does not involve in any manner the length of service. Retirement, in effect, is a pension or a compensation, and when earned neither length of time, length of service, nor age is an essential factor. Whenever, and on the spot, and at the time, the injury or wound or disability has been incurred in line of duty, however short the period of service may have been, that compensation becomes immediately due and payable. That is the rule for disability retirement with reference to the officers of the Regular Army, and, in my opinion, it is the law at the present time relating to all officers, providing the War Department were favorably disposed. In support of this contention permit me, Mr. President, to call your attention to General Orders, No. 75, War Department, August 17, 1918, which read in part as follows:

This country has but one Army, the United States Army. It includes all land forces in the service of the United States. These forces, however raised, lose their identity in that of the United States Army. Distinctive appellations such as Regular Army, Reserve Corps, National Guard, and National Army, heretofore employed in the administration and command, will be discontinued and the single term "United States Army" will be exclusively used.

Orders having reference to the United States Army as divided into separate and component forces of distinct origin, or assuming or contemplating such a division, are to that extent revoked.

Mr. President, can it be possible that in the hour of our greatest need, when the battle was fiercely raging overseas, when we had approximately a total of 82,000 officers, out of which number there were 76,000 emergency officers, or more than 90 per cent, that as an encouragement for our boys to carry on, General Order No. 75, which I have just read, was issued? If we have but one Army, the Army of the United States, what could that order mean? It could mean nothing less, Mr. President, than an obligation pledging uniformity and equality of treatment under the law, and I do not understand, Mr. President, how a policy which grants a given compensation to a major or a captain or a lieutenant who was merged into that Army through that order from the so-called Regular Army, and denies it to an emergency officer who came from a different walk in life, can have any relationship to uniformity or equality. It can only be characterized as rank discrimination and an outrageous breach of good faith.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BURSUM. I yield.

Mr. WILLIS. I have just been handed a telegram from a prominent ex-emergency officer in my State making certain statements, and I desire to ask the Senator as to his view of these statements. First, the officer says:

What we are asking is less than is now given Regular Army, Navy, and Marine Corps officers.

Mr. BURSUM. That is true, for this reason, that the disability required in order for the officers to qualify under the provisions of this bill, in order to be retired with three-fourths pay, the same as is the Regular Army officer, must be 30 per cent or over, while the law relating to the Regular Army simply requires that the disability must be sufficient to unfit the officer for duty or service.

Mr. WILLIS. If the Senator will further yield, I desire to ask him another question, because he has given much study to this. Another statement in this telegram is as follows:

Emergency Navy and Marine Corps officers are the only officers now being denied this relief.

Is that a fact?

Mr. BURSUM. Will the Senator read that again?

Mr. WILLIS. It says:

Emergency Navy and Marine Corps officers are the only officers now being denied this relief.

Mr. BURSUM. They were given this relief.

Mr. WILLIS. The Senator says they were given this relief?

Mr. BURSUM. They were given the relief under an act of Congress and have been retired. That law was in effect for nearly a year and a half, authorizing their retirement, and it was a much more liberal measure than is this bill.

Mr. WILLIS. Then the statement "Emergency Navy and Marine Corps officers are the only officers being denied this relief" is not accurate?

Mr. BURSUM. No, Senator; I do not so understand it. I think the author of that telegram must have gotten mixed. They were the only ones who were granted retirement.

Mr. WILLIS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President, the senior Senator from New York has stated that at no time in the history of this country has the matter of rank been made a basis for the granting of a pension or compensation. With that statement I disagree. His statement is not historically correct. Pensions were allowed immediately after the Mexican War taking one-half of the salary allowed as a basis for fixing the amount of the pension and providing a limitation that the maximum pension should not exceed one-half the salary of a lieutenant colonel; but every officer was given a pension in proportion to his rank. The basis was 50 per cent, and the same allowance was given to an officer whether he was a member of the Regular Army or of the Volunteer forces. That was the universal rule from the time of the Revolution up until the Civil War. For nearly a hundred years the principle of granting an allowance to disabled officers in this country was upon the basis of their salaries during the war, and there was no discrimination between the Volunteers and the Regular Army.

In support of that proposition, Mr. President, permit me to call the attention of the Senate to section 4730 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the Mexican War, which reads as follows:

Any officer, noncommissioned officer, musician, or private, whether of the Regular Army or Volunteers, disabled by reason of injury received or disease contracted while in the line of duty in actual service in the War with Mexico, or in going to or returning from the same, who received an honorable discharge, shall be entitled to a pension proportionate to his disability, not exceeding for total disability half the pay of his rank at the date at which he received the wound or contracted the disease which resulted in such disability. But no pension shall exceed half the pay of a lieutenant colonel.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BURSUM. In just a moment. This law gives absolute equality and places on an equal basis the Regular Army and the Volunteer Army, and the basis for pensions was that of rank in service.

I now yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Would the Senator like to see a law of that sort duplicated now?

Mr. BURSUM. I am answering the statement made by the Senator on Friday last.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I know; but I am asking the Senator a question, if he will kindly answer.

Mr. BURSUM. I would like to see a law of that kind so far as the officers of the Regular Army and the Volunteer Army are concerned. Yes; they should be on an equality.

Mr. WADSWORTH. And the Senator would restrict it to half the pay of a lieutenant colonel?

Mr. BURSUM. That is a matter of detail.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is a very important detail.

Mr. BURSUM. I do not know that I would restrict it, but the principle is there. The principle is involved of equality between those of the Regular Army and those of the Volunteer Army, and that the basis shall be the salary which was paid them while in the service. That is the point I am attempting to bring out.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator has brought out his point all right, but he cited a statute in support of the bill. The bill does not restrict the maximum pension to one-half the pay of a lieutenant colonel.

Mr. BURSUM. Oh, no; it does not. The point I have brought out is in answer to the statement of the Senator from New York to the effect that this was the first time in the history of the country Congress had proposed pension legislation which discriminated between the Regular Army and the Volunteer.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; I said between the officers and men.

Mr. BURSUM. No; where the rank was even.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The legislation to which the Senator refers includes the enlisted men of the Mexican War.

Mr. BURSUM. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But the Senator's bill does not include the enlisted men of this war.

Mr. BURSUM. No; I agree with the Senator that it does not. In no way, shape, manner, or form does it give away or take away any of the privileges which the enlisted men had.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It merely gives the officers additional privileges.

Mr. BURSUM. It merely eliminates the discrimination between classes within classes. It eliminates the discrimination between Regular Army officers and the so-called emergency officers.

Mr. WADSWORTH. And it establishes a discrimination between officers on the one side and enlisted men on the other.

Mr. BURSUM. Oh, not at all. The Senator can not bring in that question unless he takes in the enlisted men of the Regular Army. That is, beside the issue and has nothing to do with it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have only read the bill, Mr. President.

Mr. BURSUM. That was the policy in the War with Mexico. The same policy has existed since the days of the Revolution. Permit me to call the attention of the Senate to an act effective January 1, 1781, entitled "Half pay for life for supernumerary officers under the reform of the Army," to take effect on the 1st day of January, 1781:

Resolved, That the commander in chief and commanding officer in the southern department direct the officers of each State to meet and agree upon the officers for the regiments to be raised by their respective States from those who incline to continue in service, and where it can not be done by agreement, to be determined by seniority, and make return of those who are to remain, which is to be transmitted to Congress together with the names of the officers reduced who are to be allowed half pay for life.

That the officers who shall continue in the service to the end of the war shall also be entitled to half pay during life, to commence from the time of their reduction.

The medical staff were pensioned January 17, 1781, as follows:

Whereas by the plan for conducting the hospital department, passed in Congress the 30th day of September last, no proper establishment is provided for the officers of the medical staff after their dismissal from public service, which, considering the custom of other nations and the late provision made for the officers of the Army after the conclusion of the war, they appear to have a just claim to, for remedy whereof and also for amending several parts of the above-mentioned plan,

Resolved, That all officers in the hospital department and medical staff hereinafter mentioned who shall continue in service to the end of the war or be reduced before that time as supernumeraries shall be entitled to and receive during life, in lieu of half pay, the following allowance, namely:

The director of the hospital equal to the half pay of a lieutenant colonel.

Chief physicians and surgeons of the Army and hospital, and hospital physicians and surgeons, purveyor, apothecary, and regimental surgeons, each equal to the half pay of a captain.

So it may be stated that the policy of the country from the time of the Revolutionary War up to the time of the Civil War has been to recognize upon a basis of equality both the Volunteer and the Regular Army, and to fix compensation or pensions upon the basis of rank. That has been the policy.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator state whether I am right in my impression that in the last statute which he read the rank was limited to captain?

Mr. BURSUM. That applies to the lower grades of the hospital force.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is what the Senator was reading from.

Mr. BURSUM. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The rank was limited to that of captain?

Mr. BURSUM. It was on the lower grades of the Hospital Corps.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No one in the Hospital Corps could receive a pension amounting to more than half the pay of a captain.

Mr. BURSUM. Oh, yes; in the higher grades the pension was limited to half the pay of a colonel. The first grade of employees was the head of the institution, who was limited to the compensation of a colonel, while those of the lower grades were limited to the compensation of a captain.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then they were not arranged in accordance with their rank.

Mr. BURSUM. That evidently was the rank which had been assigned to those particular places.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Were there no first lieutenants?

Mr. BURSUM. Not in that hospital. I guess there were not any. They were all captains and colonels.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Were there no majors?

Mr. BURSUM. Probably not. They did not mention any. I was not present, of course.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is it not to be inferred that the Congress of 1781, which the Senator believes should guide the deliberations of this Congress in the matter of retired pay, placed a limitation of colonel and captain, respectively, in order that men of other grades should not receive the half pay of their grades? There must be some other grades besides captain and colonel.

Mr. BURSUM. There are in the other act. It is only in the one act where reference is made to the Hospital Corps that they refer to the two grades, but in the other act they take in all the grades.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is it not true that in the statute which the Senator read a moment ago applicable to Mexican War pensions, Congress in that case did not fix the pay of retirement on the basis of rank throughout?

Mr. BURSUM. Yes; it did.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It limited it to half the pay of a lieutenant colonel.

Mr. BURSUM. Oh, yes; it made the maximum half the pay of a lieutenant colonel, as it was made on the basis of rank. That was the basis.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Up to a certain point, and then it stopped.

Mr. BURSUM. Yes; up to a certain point.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator's bill does not do that?

Mr. BURSUM. It does not. As a matter of fact, as the Senator knows, there are none to come in above the rank of colonel, so a limitation of that kind would not help any.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not know; I have no information on that point.

Mr. BURSUM. There are none to come in above the rank of colonel, and there are only 12 colonels possibly eligible.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That I do not know. It is a matter of principle and not of numbers. The Senator's bill puts no maximum on at all. It may go to the rank of major general.

Mr. BURSUM. That is true. However, it is well known there is no major general, there are no brigadier generals, and there are no generals of any kind to come in under the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Under the bill of the Senator they may come in later.

Mr. BURSUM. They could if they were available, but they are not available. The Senator from New York must remember that the emergency officers were not made up of brigadier generals. They were mostly second lieutenants, first lieutenants, and captains, with some majors and a few colonels.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator also knows there were several dozen brigadier generals who were emergency officers.

Mr. BURSUM. But none of them got hurt. None of them are on the disability list.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is a matter to be brought out in the future.

Mr. BURSUM. They are not on the rolls. They are not reported. The War Risk Bureau knows nothing about them.

Mr. WADSWORTH. They do not have to know anything about them now. Those injuries may develop later.

Mr. BURSUM. How could an injury come later if incurred in line of duty?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It can be asserted and claimed and be the subject of proof. That is the case to-day in connection with all the men who are getting compensation.

Mr. BURSUM. I doubt it. Of course, if a man has temporary disability, where the permanent rating can not be ascertained, they are allowed the full rating.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Wherever it goes to more than 30 per cent a man goes on the retired list regardless of his rank.

Mr. BURSUM. But it must be a permanent rating. The application must have been made within 12 months after the passage of the act.

Mr. President, the emergency officers of the marines and of the Navy were retired with three-fourths pay under authority granted by Congress. That legislation was in force for more than a year. The senior Senator from New York declared that it was passed without the knowledge of Congress. I was not a Member of the Senate at that time. However, I do recall that when this legislation was passed it was announced through the press all over the country. It was given great publicity as representing a fair, decent policy. When it was repealed not a word was said about it. Very few Members knew of its repeal until after the act. It was not given the publicity the bill was given at the time of enactment, and if my information is correct, the senior Senator from New York voted for the enactment of that retirement bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I dislike to correct the Senator, but—

Mr. BURSUM. Is not that true?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think the Senator will find there was no roll call.

Mr. BURSUM. Was the Senator in the Chamber at the time?

Mr. WADSWORTH. There was no roll call. It would be immaterial whether the Senator was in the Chamber or not.

Mr. BURSUM. Was the Senator in the Chamber?

Mr. WADSWORTH. My statement was made the other day. I was in the Senate at the time and the Senator from New Mexico was not. The statement made by the Senator from New York the other day was to the effect that that provision slipped through Congress practically without observation, and that statement is true.

Mr. BURSUM. How did it come to be so widely advertised?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It was probably advertised because it offered something. I understand the Senator to say now that under the terms of his bill application must be made within one year after the passage of the bill?

Mr. BURSUM. Yes; that is an amendment which I offered to the bill and which was agreed to.

Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] read into the Record a letter from W. H. Gilmore, a disabled soldier, which letter was addressed to the Secretary of War, protesting against the proposed retirement of disabled emergency officers. The Senator expressed the opinion that he differed from the spirit of hostility shown by the writer. The Senator also informed the Senate that the War Department had prepared mimeographed copies of Gilmore's letter and sent them to Senators as evidence that this retirement bill should not pass.

Mr. President, who is Mr. Gilmore? In looking up the record I find that he was drafted in New York, served three months at Camp Upton with the Seventy-seventh Division, and was discharged with tuberculosis. The records indicate that he had an incipient case when drafted. Under such circumstances, in my opinion, it was very fortunate to have been so drafted, as, on that account, he became one of the early beneficiaries of the war risk compensation act to the extent of $157.50 a month for compensation and insurance for about four years.

Mr. President, I submit that this unfortunate sick boy would have served his country loyally and faithfully had he been able to do so, but his service was brief; he had no experience whatever, and his unfortunate condition did not permit him to obtain any knowledge of any kind or character regarding the service, the sacrifice made by, or compensation to which emergency officers were entitled. This evidence, to my mind, is absolutely incompetent. I am surprised that the War Department should seize upon a letter from an unfortunate boy to be used as propaganda against the adoption of a rightful policy toward disabled emergency officers.

Mr. President, in this connection my attention has been called to an open letter written by a disabled former soldier printed in the Stars and Stripes, a service newspaper. I send the letter to the Secretary's desk and request that it may be included in my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

EMERGENCY OFFICERS.

The Honorable SECRETARY OF WAR,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have read in the Stars and Stripes newspaper a letter from W. H. Gilmore addressed to the Secretary of War and objecting to having disabled emergency Army officers placed on the Army list with retired pay.

Now, Mr. Secretary, I do not know Mr. Gilmore or what service he had, but there is something more to tell on the other side of the question, of which I should like to speak from personal knowledge and experience.

I was drafted in 1918 on the Pacific coast and served with the Ninety-first Division (Infantry) throughout the war until it was demobilized. We participated in the battles of St. Mihiel, Meuse-Argonne, and the crossing of the Scheldt River in Belgium, so that I saw a little real war service.

In the Argonne we had a Regular Army general commanding our brigade, who was relieved of his command out in the middle of no man's land on the first morning of the battle, and it was common talk that he had tried to order a retreat or retirement without any need or cause. Then, the next day, our Regular Army colonel was relieved from command of the regiment. It was also common talk that he had failed in handling his regiment in battle. The Regular Army lieutenant colonel was wounded, and we had nothing but emergency officers to command us and lead the attack. In three days our division penetrated several organized German lines and advanced more than 13 kilometers, although it was our first time in the front line.

I was in the headquarters detachment of my battalion, and all the officers were emergency officers. They were always on the line, and 13 of them were casualties, including the major and all his staff, three of the lieutenants being killed.

Now, Mr. Secretary, no doubt many brave Regular Army officers were equally gallant in battle, but I can only speak of what I saw, and these were all emergency officers.

I was only a private, Mr. Secretary, but I found that when a man did his best the officers were usually square and treated him white while we were in the Army. Since I was discharged my health broke down, and then my former officers were the only friends, as I found when I called on them. The War Risk Bureau would not do a thing for me until I wrote to my officers, and they told the bureau what kind of a soldier I had been. Then my case was taken into consideration and results followed quickly.

This is only one ex-soldier's opinion, but if there is reason why our officers were not as good as any others in the service and if there is any reason the disabled ones should not be treated as well by the Government as the other kinds of officers, I certainly can't see it.

Formerly battalion runner, First Battalion, Three hundred and sixty-fourth Infantry, Ninety-first Division.

Member of Champagne Post, No. 195, Veterans of Foreign Wars.

Most sincerely,

CHARLES F. WRIGHT,
1933 North Baltimore Street, Baltimore, Md.

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President, I call attention to the vast difference in opinion between Pvt. Wright, as expressed in his letter, and the other private soldier referred to. Pvt. Wright served overseas; he was disabled in line of duty, and his experience qualifies him as a witness worthy of belief.

The distinguished Senator from Wisconsin also mentioned the fact that he had interviewed a private soldier at some place in his own State, who had expressed an opinion opposing this legislation. Mr. President, can anyone imagine what chance that boy had after the junior Senator from Wisconsin, with all his power of rhetoric, had gotten him in a corner and turned loose his guns, shooting him full of the poison which creates class hatred, and perhaps picturing to him a possible example, such as the Senator so eloquently pictured in the Senate on Friday last, of some colonel, disabled on account of the "flu" in Washington, being pensioned at the rate of $3,000, while he, the poor private, would only receive $360? In self-defense, confronted with the masterful advocate from Wisconsin, the soldier could only say "Amen."

But, Mr. President, the compensation of the enlisted men is all beside the question. It has no relationship to the bill. This bill neither takes away nor gives any benefits, nor does it in any way affect the compensation now allowed to the enlisted man. So far as I am concerned, I want to see all disabled soldiers amply taken care of, no matter what the cost may be. If the allowance is insufficient, let us increase that allowance. Let us treat justly and liberally all disabled veterans.

Mr. President, the American Legion at its general convention in Kansas City, representing approximately 1,000,000 soldiers, asked Congress to pass this bill; the veterans of foreign wars have asked Congress to pass this bill; the veterans of the Spanish-American War have asked Congress to pass this bill; the Colonial Dames of the State of New York have asked Congress to pass this bill; the Union League, of Chicago, have asked this Congress to pass this bill. I submit, Mr. President, that the veterans' organizations mentioned, whose membership runs far above a million, are better qualified to speak of the desires and wishes of the enlisted men than are one or two whose opinions have been presented to the Senate by the opponents of this bill.

Mr. President, the boys who will be affected by this bill are those who are seriously injured and crippled, who have been rendered incapable of pursuing their usual vocations. There may be an exception now and then, but, Mr. President, during the hearings which were held upon this bill about 30 or more disabled emergency officers appeared before the committee. The testimony of several of them was included in the printed hearings, some of which was read by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. Before the Committee on Military Affairs appeared men who had lost legs or arms; others who had been shell shocked, some of them wrecked in both mind and body, on account of the terrific suffering to which they had been exposed during the war. The class of men who will be taken care of under this bill typify such men as Maj. Whittlesey, of what is generally known as the "Lost Battalion" of the Seventh Division in the Argonne Forest, who for five days was under fire of the Germans directed upon him from all sides. Out of 679 men in his command 70 per cent became casualties and approximately 110 were killed. Not only were these boys obliged to withstand the bombardment of the enemy but on the third day of the fight for more than an hour and a half they were bombarded by the American Artillery in the rear. In the midst of all this hell the emergency officers held out to the end. Col. Whittlesey has gone to the great beyond. His end, a sad and tragic one, was no doubt caused by his condition, which was a result of his suffering while in service. We can not do anything for him. He will be cared for by a higher power.

Mr. President, it seems to me there should be no hesitation in granting that which is justly due to the seriously disabled emergency officers who served their country so faithfully and heroically and demonstrated their efficiency and capacity in time of need.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from New Mexico if it would be agreeable to him to lay aside temporarily the unfinished business, so that we may take up an appropriation bill?

Mr. BURSUM. Yes; I yield for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10267) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, with permission of the Senator from Wyoming, I should like to present three sundry amendments intended to be proposed by me to the Interior Department appropriation bill.

Mr. WARREN. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. POMERENE. I ask that they may be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and I hope they will receive favorable consideration at the hands of the committee.

Mr. WARREN. That bill is under consideration in the committee now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendments intended to be proposed by the Senator from Ohio will be received and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill may be dispensed with, and that the bill may be read for amendment, the amendments of the committee to be first considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Assistant Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 3, line 3, in the items for office of Secretary of the Senate, to increase the number of laborers at $720 each, from "two" to "three," and in line 4, to increase the total from "$88,630" to "$89,350."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 6, in the items for Senate committee employees, after the words "Finance—clerk, $3,000," to insert "special assistant to the committee, $3,000"; and on page 5, line 21, to increase the total appropriation for Senate committee employees from "$260,960" to "$263,960."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 5, in the items for office of Sergeant at Arms and Doorkeeper of the Senate, to increase the compensation of the chief telephone operator, from "$1,500" to "$1,800," and in line 13, to increase the total from "$154,280" to "$154,580."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 11, to increase the appropriation for driving, maintenance, and operation of automobile for the Vice President, from "$2,240" to "$2,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, line 6, after the word "exceeding," to strike out "$1.25 per printed page," and to insert "25 cents per hundred words"; and in line 7, to strike out "$50,000" and to insert "$100,000," so as to make the paragraph read:

For expenses of inquiries and investigations ordered by the Senate, including compensation to stenographers to committees, at such rate as may be fixed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, but not exceeding 25 cents per 100 words, $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, after line 9, to insert:

For repairs, improvements, equipment, and supplies for Senate kitchens and restaurants, Capitol Building and Senate Office Building, including personal and other services, to be expended from the contingent fund of the Senate, under the supervision of the Committee on Rules, United States Senate, $30,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 20, after line 6, to insert:

PUBLIC BUILDINGS COMMISSION,

For salaries and expenses of the Public Buildings Commission authorized in the act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes, approved March 1, 1919, to be immediately available and to remain available until expended, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 22, line 19, to strike out "$39,440" and to insert "$55,654," so as to make the paragraph read:

Senate Office Building: For maintenance, miscellaneous items and supplies, and for all necessary personal and other services for the care and operation of the Senate Office Building, under the direction and supervision of the Senate Committee on Rules, $55,654.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 22, line 24, to strike out "$5,000" and to insert "$7,500," so as to make the paragraph read:

For furniture for the Senate Office Building and for labor and material incident thereto and repairs thereof, window shades, awnings, carpets, glass for windows and bookcases, desk lamps, window ventilators, name plates for doors and committee tables, electric fans, etc., $7,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the items for the Library of Congress, page 26, line 23, after the words "Superintendent, $3,000," to insert "inspector of stacks, $1,500," and on page 27, line 9, to change the total of the appropriation from "$65,580" to "$67,080."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the items for the Library of Congress, page 28, line 18, to strike out "$2,500" and to insert "$3,000," so as to make the paragraph read:

Temporary services: For special and temporary services, including extra special services of regular employees, at the discretion of the Librarian, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 29, line 11, to strike out "$25,000" and to insert "$45,000," so as to make the paragraph read:

To enable the Librarian of Congress to employ competent persons to gather, classify, and make available, in translations, indexes, digests, compilations, and bulletins, and otherwise, data for or bearing upon legislation, and to render such data serviceable to Congress and committees and Members thereof, $45,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 29, line 23, after the word "expressage," to insert the word "postage," so as to make the paragraph read:

For service in connection with distribution of card indexes and other publications of the Library: Chief of division, $3,000; chief assistant, $1,800; assistants—2 at $1,600 each, 3 at $1,500 each, 3 at $1,400 each, 4 at $1,200 each, 4 at $1,100 each, 4 at $1,000 each; for services of assistants at salaries less than $1,000 per annum and for piecework and work by the hour, $24,000, including not exceeding $500 for freight charges, expressage, postage, traveling expenses connected with such distribution, and expenses of attendance at meetings when incurred on the written authority and direction of the librarian; in all, $53,900.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 31, line 11, to increase the appropriation for contingent expenses of the Library of Congress from "$8,000" to "$10,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I ask that, commencing on page 31, line 13, the balance of that page down to line 20 on the next page may be permitted to go over until to-morrow morning.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Under the heading "Library Building and Grounds," it is proposed to pass over all down to and including line 19 on page 32.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be passed over. The Secretary will state the next amendment of the committee.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 33, line 14, in the items for the Library Building (under Architect of the Capitol), to strike out "$5,000" and to insert "$6,000," so as to read:

For extension of the steel stack for storage of catalogue cards in the card division, $6,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 35, line 21, in the items for the Government Printing Office, to insert, "and the Public Printer is hereby authorized to furnish, upon requisition of the Secretary of the Senate, such printing and binding as may be necessary for the official use of the Architect of the Capitol."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, there is one item in this bill that I want to ask about. It is on page 31, under "Salaries: Superintendent." The law was changed.

Mr. WARREN. I have asked to have that whole subject go over until to-morrow.

Mr. HARRISON. That goes over?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill has been read. What is the pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, at the request of two or more Senators that this item should be laid over, I ask to have the bill laid aside for the present, and I will move to take it up to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, if there is no Senator here who desires to take up the unfinished business, as it will probably take us quite a time to get a quorum, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, why can we not get a vote on the Bursum bill, which is now pending? It is only half past 4.

Mr. JONES of Washington. We would have to have a quorum.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harris	McNary	Sheppard
Brandegee	Harrison	Moses	Simmons
Bursum	Heflin	Nelson	Smith
Cameron	Johnson	New	Swanson
Caraway	Jones, N. Mex.	Newberry	Trammell
Cummins	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Underwood
Dial	Kellogg	Page	Warren
Gerry	Kendrick	Pittman	Watson, Ga.
Glass	Ladd	Pol Dexter
Gooding	McKinley	Pomerene

The VICE PRESIDENT. Thirty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is not present. The Secretary will call the names of the absentees.

The Assistant Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and the following Senators answered to their names when called:

Ball	Edge	Robinson	Sterling
Borah	King	Shortridge	Walsh, Mass.
Calder	Lodge	Spencer	Walsh, Mont.
Capper	Phipps	Stanfield	Willis

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] are detained at a meeting of the Finance Committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. What is the pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President, as no Senator seems to be desirous of speaking on the unfinished business, I ask that it be put to a vote.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhulse, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (S. 2736) providing for the conveyance of certain unused military reservations in the State of Massachusetts to the city of Salem and the town of Marblehead, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 77) for the consolidation of forest lands within the Clearwater, St. Joe, and Selway National Forests.

The message further announced that the House returned to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the bill (S. 2024) for the relief of Blanche Winters.

The message also announced that the House had passed, without amendment, Senate bills of the following titles:

S. 29. An act authorizing the Secretary of War to grant to Lloyd E. Gandy, of Spokane, Wash., his heirs and assigns, the right to overflow certain lands on the Fort George Wright Military Reservation, at Spokane, Wash., on such terms and conditions with respect to improvements to be made on the present target range as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, or in lieu of such improvements to be made on the present target range the Secretary of War may accept a conveyance to the United States of such other lands to be designated by the Secretary of War as may be deemed suitable for a target range in exchange for such overflow lands; that to facilitate the acquisition of the necessary additional lands the Secretary of War is authorized to condemn land necessary and suitable for target-range purposes, such condemnation to be at the expense of said Lloyd E. Gandy, grantee, his heirs and assigns;

S. 52. An act for the relief of the Stevens Institute of Technology, of Hoboken, N. J.;

S. 160. An act for the relief of Kristina Furbak;

LANDS IN MASSACHUSETTS.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from New Mexico if he will yield to me for a moment, in order that the amendments of the House to a Senate bill may be laid before the Senate and agreed to.

Mr. BURSUM. I yield for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 2736) providing for the conveyance of certain unused military reservations in the State of Massachusetts to the city of Salem and the town of Marblehead, which were, on page 1, line 13, to strike out all after "acres" down to and including "States," in line 5, on page 2, and on page 3, line 2, after "acres," to insert:

Provided, however, That said conveyances shall be subject to the conditions and reversions herein provided for and shall be used for public park purposes, or other public use only, and shall be subject to the right of the United States at any and all times and in any manner to assume control of, hold, use, and occupy without license, consent, or leave from said city or said town any or all of said land for any and all military, naval, or lighthouse purposes, free from any conveyance, charges, encumbrances, or liens made, created, permitted, or sanctioned, thereon by said city or said town: Provided further, That the United States shall not be or become liable for any damages or compensation whatever to the said city or said town for any future use by the Government of any or all of the above-described land for any of the above-mentioned purposes: And provided further, That if said land shall not be used for the purposes hereinabove mentioned the same or such parts thereof not so used shall revert to the United States.

Mr. LODGE. I understand that the amendments do not change the substance of the bill at all, but place the provisions a little more explicitly in another part of the bill. I therefore move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

RETIREMENT OF DISABLED ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire to know what the Senator from New Mexico has proposed with regard to the bill now under consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill in charge of the Senator from New Mexico is not now before the Senate, having been temporarily laid aside.

Mr. BURSUM. I ask that Senate bill 1565 be laid before the Senate, so that we may get a vote on it.

Mr. KING. Is that subject to debate, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair rules that the Senator from New Mexico has the right to recall the bill after it has been temporarily laid aside.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1565) making eligible for retirement under the same conditions as now provided for officers of the Regular Army all officers of the United States Army during the World War who have incurred physical disability in line of duty.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not desire to speak upon this bill, Mr. President, but I am very desirous that it shall be disposed of for the reason, as I have given notice, that I want to bring forward another bill which is of great importance, and I do not want any unnecessary delay in the passage or other disposition of the pending bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have been absent substantially all the afternoon because of attendance upon a committee. I was advised this morning that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] was detained from the Senate because of temporary illness. May I inquire whether he has been here to-day? The Senator from Wisconsin desires to move to recommit that bill, as I understand it.

In the absence of the Senator from Wisconsin I shall feel constrained to take up some time, until he returns to-morrow morning, and I hope it may go over until to-morrow morning. I have no objection to taking up this measure for a final vote to-morrow.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, my attention was diverted for the moment, and I do not know what arrangements are in progress at the present time. I only desire to say that I reported to-day the treaty between the United States and Japan, commonly known as the Yap treaty, and I shall move to take it up at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. CUMMINS. I gave notice a day or two ago that at the conclusion of the consideration of the pending bill I would move to take up the bill relating to the valuation of the railroads, and I intend to pursue that course.

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President, in order to accommodate the Senator from Utah—

Mr. KING. No; I am speaking now for an absent Senator, who is ill, and who, I was advised, desires to make a motion to recommit.

Mr. BURSUM. Does the Senator from Utah desire to submit that motion now?

Mr. KING. No; I prefer not to do so, because I could not debate it as the Senator from Wisconsin could.

Mr. BURSUM. I want to bring the bill to a vote now, if possible. Is not the Senator willing to avoid delay in this matter?

Mr. KING. I have no objection to the pending bill being voted upon to-morrow, but I do feel that it ought to go over until to-morrow, in view of the fact that a motion to recommit will be made, and I desire to submit a few observations upon the motion to recommit.

Mr. HARRISON. May I make a suggestion? Can we not agree that after 1 o'clock to-morrow speeches shall be limited to 5 minutes or 10 minutes on any amendment or on the bill?

Mr. KING. I have no objection to agreeing that after the morning hour the bill shall be disposed of within two hours. If the morning business closes at 1 o'clock, I have no objection to an agreement to conclude debate and vote upon the bill at 3 o'clock.

Mr. BURSUM. The Senator will agree to a vote at 3 o'clock to-morrow?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. I assume the proposition is to vote at not later than 3 o'clock.

Mr. KING. Yes; not later than 3 o'clock. I think Senators ought to have reasonable notice that the vote will be taken.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Permit me to make the suggestion that at the conclusion of the morning hour to-morrow debate be limited to 10 minutes by any Senator upon the bill or any amendment offered thereto.

Mr. KING. Let me suggest to the Senator to word the agreement in this way: That one hour may be devoted to general discussion, without limitation, after which for one hour debate shall be limited to 10 minutes by any Senator.

Mr. WILLIS. I suppose the Senator from Utah understands that that would require the call of the roll for a quorum.

Mr. LODGE. What is the agreement now being made?

Mr. KING. None is being made; there is simply a proposition before the Senate. I did not want a vote upon the bill tonight, owing to the absence of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] and one or two other Senators, and I suggested that I had no objection to voting upon the bill to-morrow; that there should be a reasonable time, say two hours, to-morrow for debate, and then a vote.

Mr. LODGE. I have no objection to voting on the bill. I merely want to give notice that I do not wish to have all the time mortgaged ahead, because I intend to move at the earliest possible moment to take up the treaty I reported to-day.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask unanimous consent that the pending bill be taken up at the conclusion of the morning business to-morrow, and that after 3 o'clock speeches be limited to five minutes.

Mr. LODGE. That means that the time will be mortgaged for several days, probably. I can not agree to that. If the Senate can make an agreement for a vote before that time, I will agree to it gladly.

Mr. KING. I am entirely willing that the Senate shall proceed to vote upon the bill and all amendments thereto, without further debate, at 3 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. BURSUM. Why not make it 2 o'clock?

Mr. KING. The morning business may take two hours.

Mr. LODGE. If we take a recess at the conclusion of the session this evening, it will cut out the morning hour to-morrow, and let us agree to take the vote at 2 o'clock.

Mr. KING. I have no objection to that.

Mr. WILLIS. We must have a quorum before that agreement can be entered into.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Is this a proposal to fix a definite hour for the vote?

Mr. KING. Yes; 2 o'clock.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will not agree to that. I will agree to the fixing of an hour after which speeches shall be limited to 10 minutes, 5 minutes, or 3 minutes, for that matter.

Mr. MOSES. The Senator from Massachusetts objects to that.

Mr. LODGE. I am ready to make an agreement to vote on the bill, but I am not ready to have the time taken up indefinitely. I think it is my first duty to bring the treaty which has been reported before the Senate as rapidly as possible.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will not agree to a provision under which amendments may be presented and no opportunity given to discuss them. We have done that time and again, and I have come to the conclusion that it is very unwise.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I believe that a suggestion can be made which will satisfy the Senator from Massachusetts as well as the Senator from Washington. I suggest that when we conclude our business for the day, we take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow, and that at 12 o'clock all speeches upon the pending bill shall be limited to five minutes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That will be entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. LODGE. I will make no objection to that, Mr. President.

Mr. JONES of Washington. But I understand that the Senator is proposing to fix a definite time for a vote.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Not at all.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I was so informed.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I would like to make an inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. NORRIS. Part of the agreement proposed is that we shall meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow. If the hour of meeting is made 12 o'clock, I shall have no objection.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am perfectly willing to enter into an agreement that we shall meet at 12 o'clock, if that is satisfactory to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I have no objection.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Let us meet at 12 and then at 1 o'clock let all speeches be limited to five minutes.

Mr. KING. I have no objection to that.

Mr. NORRIS. That is agreeable to me.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I ask unanimous consent that that order be made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the unanimous-consent agreement is entered into.

The agreement was reduced to writing as follows:

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT.

It is agreed by unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes the business of this day it will take a recess until 12 o'clock meridian to-morrow (Tuesday, February 21, 1922), and that from and after the hour of 1 o'clock p. m. on said last-named day no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than five minutes upon the bill S. 1565, or more than once or longer than five minutes upon any amendment that may be offered thereto.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive business the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the Senate, pursuant to the order previously made, took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, February 21, 1922, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 20, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Lord God of Hosts, amid the pleasures and the sorrows in the tumult and the strife day by day the old world standeth, and we know that God is good. Thou dost bring music out of discord, contentment out of failure, and morning out of evening. Darkness is the wing of Thy mercy and silence is the breath of Thy kindness. In our words, temper, and conduct may there be thought, calmness, and authority. We would have our energies, our powers of effort, and our desire of achievement declare loudly for every plea and principle of right. Let the future hold for us visions of a brighter dawn, a purer delight, and always incline our hearts to keep Thy law. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, February 18, 1922, was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for indefinite leave of absence for my colleague, Mr. FROTHINGHAM, on account of illness.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent for indefinite leave of absence for his colleague, Mr. FROTHINGHAM, on account of illness. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CALENDAR FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT.

The SPEAKER. The Calendar for Unanimous Consent is in order to-day. The Clerk will report the first bill on the calendar.

CAMP HENRY KNOX, KY.

The first business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 2072) to authorize the Secretary of War to make and receive conveyances effecting an exchange of title to the railroad rights of way at Camp Henry Knox, Ky., and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized to execute and deliver a conveyance of title to the Chicago, St. Louis & New Orleans Railroad Co. to that certain strip of land in the military reservation at Camp Henry Knox, Ky., belonging to the United States of America, upon which the line of said railroad was relocated and the new depots and transportation structures were erected at Camp Henry Knox, between the junction points of the old and new locations, a distance of approximately 1½ miles, which conveyance, when executed and delivered, shall convey to the said railroad company all the title to the land so conveyed now vested in the United States of America.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War be hereby authorized to receive in behalf of the United States deed or deeds of conveyance and releases from the mortgage obligations of said railroad company to the old right of way of said company between the points of junction mentioned in the preceding section.

SEC. 3. That the detail description of said conveyances effecting a change of title made necessary by the relocation of said railroad at said point be set forth in said conveyances in accordance with the descriptions contained in a certain contract and agreement between the said Chicago, St. Louis & New Orleans Railroad Co., the Illinois Central Railroad Co., and the Director General of Railroads, dated May 23, 1921, which agreement has been formally assented to by the Secretary of War, in which the land to be conveyed to the railroad company is shown in yellow tint on the blue print attached to the said contract, and extending from "C" to "D" thereon, while the land to be conveyed by the railroad company is shown in carmine tint on said blue print and extending from "A" to "B."

SEC. 4. That all laws in conflict herewith be, and they are hereby, repealed.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to execute and deliver a conveyance of title to the Chicago, St. Louis & New Orleans Railroad Co. to that certain strip of land in the military reservation at Camp Knox, Ky., upon which the line of said railroad was relocated and the new depots and transportation structures were erected at Camp Knox, described as follows: Beginning at the point of intersection of the present westerly right-of-way line of the Chicago, St. Louis & New Orleans Railroad Co., with the southerly line of a highway which crosses said railroad under Bridge J-29-8, said point being 780 feet northerly from milepost 30 from Louisville, Ky., and running thence westerly along said southerly line 17 feet more or less to a point 50 feet distant westerly from the center line of the main track of said railroad measured at a right angle thereto; thence southerly parallel to the center line of the relocated main track of said railroad and 50 feet westerly therefrom a distance of 780 feet to a point opposite milepost 30 from Louisville, thence westerly perpendicular to said relocated main track 90 feet; thence southerly parallel to said main track 1,701 feet more or less to the northerly line of the highway which crosses said railroad under Bridge J-30-3; thence easterly along the line of said highway 50 feet more or less to a point which is 90 feet distant westerly from the center line of the aforesaid relocated main track measured perpendicularly thereto; thence southerly in a direct line 964 feet to a point which is 50 feet distant westerly from the center line of said relocated track; thence southerly parallel to the center line of said relocated track and 50 feet distant therefrom, 4,457 feet more or less to a point in the westerly line of the present right of way of said railroad about 1,800 feet southerly from milepost 31 from Louisville, Ky.; thence northerly along the westerly line of the present right of way of said railroad 610 feet more or less to a point 50 feet distant easterly from the center line of said relocated main track measured perpendicularly thereto; thence northerly parallel to said center line 3,700 feet; thence easterly at a right angle to said line 50 feet; thence northerly parallel to said center line and 100 feet distant therefrom 1,125 feet; thence westerly perpendicular to said center line 25 feet; thence northerly parallel to said center line 1,861 feet more or less to a point in the westerly line of the present right of way of said railroad; thence northerly along said right-of-way line 655 feet more or less to the point of beginning; reserving to the Government the perpetual right to use and have kept open the underpasses now in use under and across said railroad.

"SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to receive, on behalf of the United States, deed or deeds of conveyance, with covenants of general warranty, and release from the mortgage obligations of said railroad companies, to the old right of way of said companies, described as follows: All that part of the original right of way of the Chicago, St. Louis & New Orleans Railroad Co., which lies south of a line drawn parallel to the center line of the relocated main track of said railroad, and 50 feet distant easterly from said center line, measured perpendicularly thereto, near mile post 30 from Louisville, Ky., and north of a line drawn parallel to said relocated main track, and 50 feet distant easterly from the center line thereof, near a point about 1,600 feet southerly from mile post 31 from Louisville, Ky., said original right of way herein conveyed, consisting of a strip of land 66 feet wide and approximately 7,200 feet long, and also a tract of land 575 feet long, 77 feet wide at the southerly end, 23 feet at the northerly end, lying on the easterly side of the aforesaid 66-foot strip, and containing eighty-five one-hundredths of an acre, more or less, and being the tract of land acquired by the railroad company from P. A. Jones and wife, recorded in book 26, page 59, in the deed records of Hardin County, Ky.

"SEC. 3. That the description of the metes and bounds of said property above stated shall be inserted in said conveyances and in addition thereto proper specifications and reference to the next immediate source from which the grantors therein derived title thereto as required by the statute of Kentucky on the subject of recording conveyances of real estate in that State, as set forth in Carroll Statutes, 1915, volume 1, section 495.

"SEC. 4. That all laws in conflict herewith be, and they are hereby, repealed."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HULL of Iowa, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

IMMIGRATION.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass House joint resolution 268, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington moves to suspend the rules and pass House joint resolution 268, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SINNOTT. Will this bill be subject to amendment under the motion to suspend the rules?

The SPEAKER. It will not.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read first.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. I think we should have a quorum, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. It is clear that no quorum is present.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington moves a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Andrew, Mass.	Fess	Kunz	Riordan
Beedy	Frothingham	Larson, Minn.	Shaw

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and thirty-one Members have answered to their names; a quorum is present.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 268) extending the operation of the immigration act of May 19, 1921.

Resolved, etc., That the operation of the act entitled "An act to limit the immigration of aliens into the United States," approved May 19, 1921, is extended to and including June 30, 1923.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. SABATH. I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. SABATH. I am.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] has 20 minutes and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] has 20 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, this resolution 268 is presented for the purpose of continuing for one year from July 1 the present 3 per cent restrictive act. It is offered so that the people of the United States may continue to have the benefit of that restriction. I am of the opinion that never again will the people of the United States return to the old custom of free immigration. [Applause.] The present 3 per cent restrictive act in the first five months of its operation reduced the net number of new immigrants in this country to 44,014. In the eight months that the law has operated it is probable that more aliens have gone out of the United States than have come in.

To-day Ellis Island is more nearly a desert than it has been for 20 years. The number of detention cases on hand there to-day is only about 400 as compared with an average of 2,000 or more daily for a long time past. New immigrants are arriving now at the rate of only 1,500 per week, whereas for every month of the year preceding this 3 per cent restrictive act the average number coming in was 15,000 a week.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Not at present; in a moment. Eight months' operation of the 3 per cent restrictive act brought to the United States only 192,000 immigrants, and it is clear that the limit of 355,000 that is authorized by the law will not be reached when the law expires at the end of next June. That is a heavy restriction when one compares it with the number of immigrants—805,000—which came in in the year immediately preceding. It is satisfactory also when one realizes that the vessels engaged in transatlantic trade have a steerage capacity for more than 1,700,000 annually, and every ship would like to see its steerage capacity filled on every trip to the United States.

It is interesting to note that the alien steamship lines are concerned over the 3 per cent act and do not want to see it continued. The Italian Government itself has complained that the operation of the 3 per cent act has greatly interfered with the Italian-owned ships and so reduced their emigrant business that they have passed an act in Italy requiring emigrants to go out only in Italian ships.

The British interests, too, are protesting and are putting British vessels on lines from Bremen to the United States in an effort to catch a little of the disappearing emigrant trade. The British Government says the United States is cutting off its nose to spite its face, but I am of the opinion that we do not see the situation through British spectacles.

A restrictive law is expected to restrict, and any law that restricts will create hardship. During the operation of the 3 per cent act for eight months the United States has admitted in excess of the quota the small number of 1,773 persons, and those have been admitted for reasons of humanity and because of extreme hardship attendant upon return trips. Many of these 1,700 admitted have been fathers or mothers of families or children. Some have been cases of immigrants who secured passport visés months before the law was enacted. Some of them have been people from Persia who started for the United States as far back as a year ago this month. Some others have been cases of Armenian orphans, and the 450 Armenians who came in one ship and were charged against Turkey's quota, which was exhausted. The Secretary of Labor admitted all of these temporarily under the provisions of the Burnett Act, and to-day I shall introduce a resolution authorizing the Secretary, in his discretion, to admit permanently those of that number now in the United States who are otherwise admissible under that law. In my opinion, a remarkably good showing has been made in putting into effect a new and untried plan for the immediate restriction of immigration.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. Were those 1,700 among those who were admitted under some special order?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No. This law was in effect for 27 days of last June, then for one year thereafter, and during the 27 days many immigrants arrived at Ellis Island who had started before the law was operative or before they had any knowledge of the law. In other words, there was not time in which to clear the seas. Then, by resolution of Congress, the Secretary was authorized to admit all of those people, about 10,000 in number, and charge them against future quotas. No persons in excess of yearly quotas were admitted by that act of Congress.

Mr. BARBOUR. And after the passage of this resolution they will be limited, as I understand it, to the actual quota, and there will be no special orders allowing any extra ones?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Except to take care of 1,700 of whom I spoke, who represent the very small number who were caught in the operations of a new and untried proceeding.

Mr. BARBOUR. And they are already here.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. They are here, and it is hoped that with the knowledge that the foreign countries have to the effect that this law is going to be effective for another year, with the knowledge of our consular agents who issue the visés, the conditions will be such that those in excess of the quotas can be reached and not be permitted to start. In fact, I think an arrangement may be made with the State Department by which visés will be issued only to those who have the right to come.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Has the gentleman's committee given consideration to the question of further restriction than the 3 per cent limit?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Is it the intention of the committee to report out some legislation of that character in the near future?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I think so. The committee is still at work on a plan which may give us a permanent restrictive immigration law.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman expect it to be reported some time this Congress?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Let me say in answer to that and in answer to all similar questions: If the Congress finally enacts this one-year extension resolution of the 3 per cent restrictive act, that extension will expire one year from this coming July, at a time when, unless there is an extraordinary session of Congress, Congress will not be in session. Therefore, if the Members of the House and of the other body feel that the people of the country want a restrictive plan continued, it will be necessary to enact additional legislation next winter. The committee of which I have the honor to be the chairman still has before it many plans. I am in sincere hope that some one of those plans will be perfected. I think the plans are heading up very nicely. I might say that some of the disturbing causes are the desire to write into the bill some paragraph to the effect that 50 per cent of what immigration we do receive shall come to us in American ships. Another plan is an insistent demand for the registration of all aliens, including newcomers and those now here. Additional penalties for steamships are desired. These are problems that can not be settled overnight.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Are the alien wives and children of those now in the United States included in the 1,700 of which the gentleman spoke?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. So that the wives and children of persons who have resided in the United States for a number of years, who have come in, will be included in that?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. All will be taken care of in the resolution which I shall offer myself, and which I am sure the committee will authorize me to report and call up in the House for action. I can not imagine that many will vote against such a resolution.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. If every country should avail itself of the full quota, how many would be admitted during the year?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Three hundred and fifty-five thousand in round numbers.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. And as a matter of fact 180,000 have been admitted?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. One hundred and ninety thousand up to the close of business on Saturday night.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. That is at the rate of 6,000 a week.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; but let me explain that. It ran at that rate or more at the beginning, but many countries that have sent immigrants have now exhausted their quotas, so that from now on until July immigration, as immigration, will dwindle.

Mr. BRIGGS. Has there been any improvement in determining who are eligible among the immigrants on the other side before they are shipped over here and landed at ports of entry?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I am very glad the gentleman has brought that up. We refer to that in the report of the majority of the committee, where a letter is printed from the Secretary of State conveying to us the protests of the Italian Government against any plan that would set up immigration officials of the United States Government in Italy. Similar protests have been received from other countries; that is to say, those countries do not feel that they can see such legislation in progress in the United States without protesting, because they would not want to agree that our immigration officials and others could detain in this country one of their nationals for 10 days, or any other time, for health inspection, immigration, or any other inspection, any more than we would be willing to agree that if I wanted to go to Italy I would have to go to New York and be in detention for 10 days to see whether I had this or that disease, or so much money.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. That would not preclude our foreign representatives from having some clearing house in a country for the purpose of establishing just when the quota has been exceeded.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It does not interfere with that plan—and that plan has been discussed before the committee—to have central points where these quotas may be reported, and that can be done under the present law.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Countries that object to our examination of immigrants over there have prima facie admitted that they are willing to ship undesirable to this country.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; and they have also asked why we should pass such a law when they say they make the examination themselves under present international arrangements governing departure of ships. But our standards differ.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman has stated to the House that after March 4 next year probably no Congress will be in session.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. And that in December a bill can be presented?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman does not intend to tell the House that as soon as this is passed, so that the docket can be cleared, the committee will not continue to work on legislation before it or will delay that legislation?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I thought I made that clear. All of the plans which have been placed before the committee are still before the committee, and the committee recognizes the necessity of coming before the House next winter with additional immigration legislation, which I, as chairman of the committee, hope will be constructive and of a permanent nature.

Mr. RAKER. Now, the chairman did not get my point.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I think I did.

Mr. RAKER. If we have June, July, and August, or the early part of this month after this becomes effective, we have some little time to take up legislation before the committee and get it in shape.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I shall call the committee for that purpose, of course, in good time. Now, I want to make this statement.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In a moment. The people want restrictive legislation; it is absolutely necessary to-day. We do not wish to take chances on losing the restriction law which we have, so we are extending it in order to be on the safe side. We could pass a bill here with various amendments which would go to the other body, and then go to the Committee on Immigration there, where it might go through the same operation of examination, suggestion, and amendment as have all bills which have been in our committee. All of that takes time. Probably I am overanxious to see that no immigration legislation gets caught behind bills in this House covering bonus legislation or tariff legislation, and that is my reason for hastening action on this resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has used 15 minutes.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I notice the resolution is only effective until June 30, 1923.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Why does not the gentleman continue it indefinitely until the committee is prepared to bring in some comprehensive act, so we will not have to go through this again next year?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will refer the gentleman to his own committee for my reason. Look at the status of passport legislation. I am inclined to believe the present passport act, which runs until otherwise changed by law, is an incentive to inaction. As far as I am concerned, I want to see immigration legislation more drastic than the 3 per cent. I want to see the quotas fixed so that all countries will have a minimum and we shall not have to do bookkeeping in the Bureau of Immigration on trifling quotas. We can improve the act, and therefore I have offered this resolution. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I wish to be called when I have used five minutes, and I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON], chairman of the Committee on Immigration, tries to make the House believe that we who oppose this makeshift legislation are for free immigration. I myself have never advocated or favored free immigration. I believe in selective immigration, and the strict but humane enforcement of the law. The chairman of the committee [Mr. JOHNSON] also stated that the steamship companies are also interested in larger or increased immigration. I agree that they are interested, and in reply to that statement desire to say I have advocated that we should embody a penal provision imposing heavy penalties upon the steamship companies who in violation of law bring people in excess of the 3 per cent quota. This has not been done and the steamship companies will continue to go unpunished, notwithstanding the terrible suffering and misery they bring to these unfortunates whom they bring in beyond the prescribed number and whom this inhumane law forces to be deported. Mr. Speaker, to eliminate that abuse I would favor that only ships which fly the American flag should be permitted to bring immigrants to our shores. Further, and digressing from the question of immigration for the moment, to my mind this may make unnecessary any ship subsidy.

Mr. Speaker, the report of the majority states that the committee has conducted extensive hearings. This is true; but it fails to state that nearly every witness, whether a private citizen, Government official, or professional investigator, has testified to the effect that the present law was impossible of enforcement. The committee in its report also states that it realizes the present act has caused some individual hardships which they endeavor to justify on the grounds that any law creates hardships. This principle, fundamentally, is just as erroneous as the act itself. The further statement is made in the majority report that the people of the United States demand the continuation of this cruel and iniquitous law. I concede that due to the misrepresentation and misinformation with which the public has been fed, it favors restriction. I speak advisedly when I say that 95 per cent of the American people who are familiar with the provisions of this law are in favor of its repeal. They do not look with favor upon a law which does not permit an American citizen to bring or send for his aged parents or his children, even though the children be over the age of 18 years. They do not believe it is for the best interest of the Nation to enforce the separation of families as has been demonstrated under the provisions of the present act.

Mr. Speaker, I agree with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Box], who, though a restrictionist, designates this act as makeshift and who states in his views that "the country has been dissatisfied with it, that the Congress itself has felt compelled to denounce it, and that the department was justified in evading its uniform enforcement." During my 15 years' membership in this House I have seen many uncalled-for laws enacted, but I do not know of a single act which has been more uniformly condemned than this one. I take it, Mr. Speaker, that nearly everyone here knows my views on this question, and notwithstanding that I am against unreasonable and unfair restriction I reiterate now as I have in the past that I would rather favor complete and positive restriction than to have this cruel and iniquitous law continued. It is a law which has and will continue, so long as it remains on our statute books, to cause more sorrow and suffering than I can describe. The law was originally passed because the Members of both Houses were deliberately and willfully misled by articles, statements, and purported interviews appearing in the press prior to its enactment and during the time it was considered. I pointed out then that it was propaganda on the part of heartless, professional propagandists.

The newspapers were filled with articles covering purported interviews had with former Immigration Commissioner Wallis, who, however, shortly after the passage of the bill, in speeches which he delivered in the city of Chicago and other sections of the country, clearly and beyond doubt contradicted many of the statements charged to him; but, of course, by that time the damage had been done. And so it was, Mr. Speaker, with the celebrated communication which Secretary Hughes later disowned, but which, nevertheless, was made use of as was Commissioner Wallis's purported interviews, which were used not only to poison the minds of the American people but also the membership of this House.

Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand extracts from a report of the State Department which was embodied in a report of the committee when this legislation was first being considered in December, 1920. It purported to be extracts from reports of various officials and consular officers and tended to show that the scum of the earth was on its way to America; that 10,000,000 immigrants were then ready to come, would pour in as the gentleman from Texas unfortunately believed and, it seems to me, still believes, who would overrun the entire United States and take possession of the Nation.

The extract from this same report on the German situation related that if the passport restrictions were removed 2,000,000 Germans were ready to come. And, lo and behold! notwithstanding the passage of the resolution terminating the state of war between the United States and Germany, which was approved July 2, 1921, up to February 8, 1922, only 11,626 German immigrants have come, which, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, is a lesser number than is permitted to come under the 3 per cent act during any one month and falls short only 1,988,374 from the number predicted. For some reason this report, which, no doubt, has been read by many Members, tended to convey the impression that 60 to 90 per cent of the immigration was of the Jewish class. The reports in this respect were just as false and untrue as those bearing on the 2,000,000 German immigration, or that the immigration—which did not materialize—has been responsible for the present-day unemployment. Notwithstanding the thousands upon thousands of Jews who have been made homeless by the terrible war, who have been driven from one country to another, and who have suffered untold hardships—yes, the tortures of hell—the official reports show that in the last seven years only about 6 per cent of the total immigration was of that race.

Mr. Speaker, every member of this committee must realize and recognize the fact that the 20 per cent monthly clause in the act has added additional and unnecessary trials and tribulations and increased the difficulties and hardships of the immigrant. To my great amazement the committee has not seen fit to recommend the elimination of that provision.

When the present law was being considered by the House I pointed out that the adoption of the 1910 census instead of the census of 1920, which was then completed, constituted a deliberate and designed discrimination against a great many deserving nationalities. I also called attention of the House then to the fact that the bill exempted and permitted the coming of actors, artists, lecturers, singers, nurses, ministers, and professors after the 3 per cent quota had been reached, but made no such exception to the parents and children over 18 years of American citizens—the wives and children, the orphaned brother or sister, of declarants. They would be barred when the 3 per cent quota had been reached. Further, Mr. Speaker, contrary to our traditions the doors are closed to political or religious refugees.

Mr. Speaker, this bill does not apply to Chinese or Japanese. It permits the coming of Chinese and Japanese students. To this I do not object, but I do object, however, to the restriction of all others. I believe that the education which the Chinese students have received in this country has been of great advantage to our Nation, and that we should continue to encourage their coming to our institutions of learning. Indeed, the Boxer indemnity waiver, which made this possible for Chinese students, has since proven beyond doubt the wisdom of our action.

Why, then, should we not permit the coming of bona fide students from other countries, especially from the newly created nations of Europe, Mexico, and from the South and Central American Republics? To my mind it is a shortsighted policy to debar them. I am of the opinion that it would be of great advantage to our Nation and a great benefit to humanity and the future welfare of the world if we would not only permit their coming but to offer a certain number of scholarships to the young men of every nation.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I wish to say that the rabid assertions of the restrictionists that 10,000,000 immigrants were waiting to come was a wild dream; not even one-tenth of that number under our present passport law have applied for visas. I can only point out that the 3 per cent law has brought about sorrow and unhappiness to thousands of American citizens and declarants who, under its drastic provisions, are separated from their kin and those they hold nearest their hearts. I can voice nor stress no greater appeal than to submit the fact that since the enactment of this legislation there has been an actual decrease beyond the number of emigrants who have left this country of immigrants coming to this country. The official statistics of the Bureau of Immigration show that up to February 8, 1922, the total number of immigrants admitted to the United States, mostly women and children, has been 191,154; the total number of emigrants, mostly men between 25 and 45, having left this country between July 1, 1921, and January 30, 1922, numbers 240,212, an actual decrease in this country of 49,058 since this law was enacted. I say to you it is fair, is it just, is it right that we should continue to cause the separation of a wife from a husband, of a mother from her child? That is what the passage of this resolution means. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has used five minutes.

Mr. SABATH. I will yield four minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIEGEL].

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Speaker, every university president throughout the Nation is opposed to this legislation, because it prevents students other than Chinese or Japanese coming into the United States after the 3 per cent quota of their particular country is exhausted. President Butler, of Columbia University, one of the leading university presidents, and a distinguished Republican, in a letter dated February 18, 1922, said in part:

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN SIEGEL: I am greatly disappointed at the news contained in yours of the 16th. This means a fight in the Senate, because the educational institutions will not sit silently by and permit that kind of barbarism to be perpetrated by the Congress.

In October it became necessary to have a special order made relieving the hardships which had arisen and which reads as follows:

OCTOBER 5, 1921.

To all commissioners of immigration and inspectors in charge at ports of entry for aliens:

It is a noteworthy fact that the immigration act approved May 19, 1921, makes no provision for excepting from the quota count or for the admission beyond the quota limits aliens who come to the United States for the purpose of following the vocation of students. Already this is working a hardship, and, in the view of the department, an administrative exception in the cases of bona fide students coming here from certain countries whose quotas for the entire year have been consumed seems advisable. It has been necessary in instances to exclude young men coming here to take collegiate courses whose bona fide status as students there was not the remotest question. The department has taken the position that it will not absolutely exclude students of this class who may arrive in excess of the quota limits of the act, but that it will, when the bona fides of the case are apparent, admit the subject temporarily for a period of one year on his personal bond.

The purpose of this letter is to authorize the officers in charge at the several ports to dispose of the cases of bona fide and otherwise admissible students destined to recognized institutions of learning in the United States, and who would otherwise be deported because of having arrived in excess of the quota limits of the act in the manner above indicated, viz, accept their personal bonds in the penalty of $500 guaranteeing their departure from the country at or before the expiration of one year from date of landing, unless, of course, their cases be otherwise disposed of in the meantime. Where the officer in charge is not convinced that the case of the applying student comes within the scope of the department's instruction, it is instructed that the records in such cases be referred to the department, as on appeal, for its consideration and decision.

E. J. HENNING,
Assistant Secretary.

Now, there is no limit to the number of Japanese students coming in, and they do come in. There is no limit to the number of Japanese generally coming into this country, because the 3 per cent quota law does not apply and they are permitted to come under the gentleman's agreement. There is no limit to the number of students coming in from China. Yet we are told that this is a fair and equal law. The 3 per cent restriction is desirable so far as Europe is concerned, but with the other countries, why a greater percentage is satisfactory. The New York Times, which is in favor of sensible restrictive immigration legislation, has said:

NO TEST COULD BE POORER.

Of all the devices yet invented for keeping "undesirables" out of the country, that of fixing a "quota" of admissible aliens for each foreign country is probably the least intelligent, the most provocative of needless hardship and justified irritation. For the literacy test, some, though poor, excuse can be given, but it is the wildest of absurdity that, because there have come over here from a certain land a certain number of persons, no more from that land shall be admitted, no matter what the individual qualifications of the applicant may be.

Under the present law and rulings people who can convince the immigration authorities of intention soon to depart are allowed to land, indeed, regardless of the "quota" limit, but such proof is not always easy to give, and some of the most undesirable of undesirables can produce it.

Quality, not quantity, should determine admissibility, and while quality is not easily ascertained, to do it should not be impossible in a country as well supplied with wise men as ours claims to be.

It has truly been said of the statute that it is one of "inhumanity by statute." The New York World on January 4, 1922, said:

INHUMANITY BY STATUTE.

If further illustrations of the inhumanity of the immigration law are desired, they can be found at Ellis Island in the families of Aaron Kalmanovitch and Moische Shipguel. Both men were born in Russia and are eligible for admission to this country because the Russian quota for the month has not been filled. Their wives were also born in Russia, and are likewise admissible, but the daughters of the two families, aged 8 and 10 months, respectively, were born in Constantinople, and are therefore held for deportation, the Turkish quota being complete.

This test of nationality that separates parents from children is even more ludicrous than the quota system itself. A child of American parents born in Constantinople would not be a Turk, and would not be classed as a Turk under American or any other law. In identifying race with the place of birth the framers of emergency immigration provisions ignored the usage of the courts of the country in dealing with our own citizens. The working of the law is not always so obviously unjust as in the case of these two families, yet every case before the immigration authorities is decided on the same fallacious principle.

Secretary of Labor Davis has confessed that it was his kind heart that led to the holiday freeing of 1,100 immigrants whose quotas had been filled. But it will take more than one kind heart, and the kindness will have to be apparent much oftener than once a year, if the damage done by the immigration act is to be remedied.

On September 8 last I wrote the following letter to the President:

HON. WARREN G. HARDING,
President of the United States.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: It is exceedingly regrettable that the immigration laws, as now being enforced, are resulting in the grossest kind of injustice. There is no reason why the same attitude taken by the Labor Department heretofore should not be followed in allowing members of families who arrive after the quota for each month has been filled to remain at Ellis Island or be allowed to land under bond and be counted in the next month's quota.

All I can say to you is that the separation of parents from children who arrive at Ellis Island—the parents being admitted and the children being sent back because they happen to arrive after the quota is filled—is something I don't believe you will approve.

The reason that I desire to bring this to your attention is because no one can picture to you in words the effect of the enforcement of this provision the way it is now being administered. Action on your part is absolutely necessary, if we are to uphold American traditions regarding humanity.

With kindest regard, yours, very truly,

ISAAC SIEGEL.

The reply of President Harding was as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, September 9, 1921.

MY DEAR MR. SIEGEL: I have your letter of September 8. I haven't any doubt in the world but the enforcement of the immigration laws is working many a hardship. My own distress has been very great over some of the specific instances which have been reported to me.

If I have the situation correctly presented, the difficulty must be charged to dishonest steamship agents, who have brought to this country innocent immigrants in spite of our continued warnings during a period of very great leniency. I know how very persistent have been the impositions, which have been made on the Government agents who have been disposed to be sympathetic and more than generous in carrying out the law. However, I am sending your letter to the Department of Labor for further information on the subject. I have great confidence in the Commissioner of Immigration, and I know the Secretary of Labor is one of the most humane and sympathetic men in the land. If there are conditions such as you suggest, I feel pretty confident that they are unavoidable under the law.

Very respectfully, yours,

WARREN G. HARDING.

What led me to write to the President was the case of a young child by the name of Freda Berman, 10 years of age, coming to a father. The mother had passed away just about the time when the ship was about to sail. The infant was ordered excluded on account of the quota law, and the father was in the United States. Let me say that to the everlasting credit of the President and Secretary Davis this infant was finally allowed to land under a bond. Over 60 cases at one time were called to the attention of the Department of Labor wherein great hardships were involved. On January 5 of this year four children coming to a father, who had been wounded in Gallipoli, were at first ordered excluded because the quota from Australia had been exhausted. I might allude to the case reported where 10 Rumanians became Russians because the United States had not recognized the partition of Europe, as the law does not refer to the places of residence but of nativity. Frequently it has happened that a child has been born in transit or different place than the parents. The result has been that under the law the parents were admissible and the child was not. A law which excludes full orphans on account of an excess quota when other blood relatives are ready to adopt such orphans and are citizens of the United States can not have the approval of the American people.

If it be contended that 3 per cent of a particular nationality is the number of immigrants which should be permitted to come from a particular country, then the logical and fair way is to adopt the last census. The figures for the census of 1920 together with the quotas for 1920 and 1910 are as follows:

NOTE: The total number of foreign born for 1920 was 13,920,692. It includes the following elements which are not considered in the calculations made in regard to restriction of immigration: Canada, China, West Indies, Japan, Mexico, South America, at sea, Central America, India, Newfoundland, country not specified.

Mr. Speaker, one of the arguments usually made by those fathering the restriction of immigration is that the cities where the foreign born predominate show a greater percentage of crime than those of the native born. In order to obtain the facts I wrote to all of the chiefs of police of all cities in the United States having a population of over 60,000 according to the census of 1920. NOTE.—Where blanks appear information was not furnished, although requested.

It is noticeable that in those cities where there is practically no foreign born there is very little difference in the percentage of crime. There is one thing noticeable, however, and that is the smaller the city the greater number of crimes are committed in proportion to the population. One fails to understand, however, why it is that the city of Washington, with a population of 437,571, should have had 56,592 arrests, while cities like Milwaukee or Newark, N. J., have about one-fourth to one-third of that number. Baltimore, with a population of over 700,000, has less crime than Washington.

The argument therefore usually made that where the foreign born are present in large numbers that crime is greater is not borne out by the facts.

Mr. Speaker, I agree most perfectly with the President when he said, "If there are conditions such as you suggest, I feel pretty confident that they are unavoidable under the law," and, as I have pointed out, it appears to me that this law, with its extension until June 30, 1923, has not met the approval of the American people.

As I have said in the report expressing the minority views to this resolution, I am in favor of excluding from the United States every person who is not mentally, morally, and physically fit and who is not a firm believer in our form of government and our institutions.

I can not, however, bring myself to believe that the American people have forgotten their ideals and their traditions of old to the extent that they are in favor of shutting the doors of this country to persons fleeing from religious or political persecution. I believe the time is coming—and it is not far distant—when they will commence to recognize once more that the alien who is to be welcomed here is to be judged solely by his good qualities and by what he is prepared to do in order to become a real American citizen and not otherwise.

I believe that our people will commence to ask questions as to why it is that sufficient courts and clerks are not provided to give aliens here the opportunity to become naturalized under conditions which will add dignity to this most important ceremony. I know of no greater problem before the American people, and I sincerely and earnestly hope that they will awaken to its importance and give the matter that earnest consideration which it deserves.

Now, I do not know of a single New York newspaper, and I do not know of any newspaper of standing in the country that is in favor of quota restrictive immigration. I say that advisedly. What does this do? How is it operating? Only the other day, a man who has been nine years in this country, has his first papers, had his wife and two children arrive at Ellis Island. His wife was sick and had been held in France until she could get well. She and the two small children were ordered deported, because the quota was filled, yet every lecturer, singer, and actor, regardless of quota, could come in.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record on this resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record on this resolution. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Box].

Mr. BOX. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I think the House should pass legislation adequately dealing with this all-important subject, and that there is no good reason for the failure of this Congress to do so. I ask leave to extend my remarks in the Record by inserting my views as stated by me in the report of the committee accompanying the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record in the manner indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BOX. The immigration act of May 19, 1921, will expire June 30, 1922. Unless some legislation is supplied in its place, 1,200,000 to 1,500,000 unfortunate, and in the main undesirable, immigrants will, during the next fiscal year, probably pour in upon our own millions of unemployed and other millions of un-Americanized aliens, most of whom are congested in our centers of industrial and city population.

The compelling necessity that this be prevented and a conviction that the Republican Congress will fail to enact anything but this inadequate makeshift drives me, as one of the minority members of the committee, to support the resolution. But the legislative situation which forces me to do so is highly unsatisfactory.

The act of May 19, 1921, has reduced immigration from a probable 1,200,000 or 1,500,000 in one year to probably less than 300,000. But that act was a makeshift enacted after two years of unproductive consideration and talk. The country has been dissatisfied with it; the Congress which enacted it have felt compelled to denounce it, and because of its alleged unworkability to modify it and authorize the nonenforcement of parts of it. Because of the same alleged vices the executive department charged with its enforcement has felt justified in evading its uniform enforcement. Another unsatisfactory resolution authorizing its partial nullification through partial nonenforcement may be expected to be smothered through soon under a suspension of the rules, so as to prevent open disclosure of what is being done. This, if done, will be two such nullification resolutions within 12 months, both based on the alleged faultiness of the law.

Now, with these alleged vices pointed out and confessed by the Republican Congress and administration which enacted the law, and after another year of failure on their part to prepare a satisfactory law, or one which they are willing to have enforced uniformly, this committee and this Republican Congress are unable to even amend the act which the Congress has itself denounced and refused to have regularly enforced. We propose to continue for another 12 months the law which the majority have denounced as such a bungle that it should not, or can not, be regularly enforced.

Why this distressing legislative inefficiency? It is not because the friends of restrictive legislation do not control the committee or Congress. The Republicans, being the majority party, have 10 of the 15 members of the committee and more than two-thirds of the Members of the House, and control the other branches of the Government. In restrictive legislation they have the uniform support of an overwhelming majority of the minority party. They can shape and pass legislation according to their will. Are they without ability to know what they want to do? They certainly have power to do their will, both in the shaping and the enactment of legislation.

Why continue a law which they declare to be so faulty that its partial nonenforcement must be assured by semiannual resolutions passed under the debate-muffling suspension of the rules?

An immigration bill which the committee would have been willing to have regularly enforced should have been reported and passed. Because I am inevitably driven to the conclusion that nothing better can be hoped for from the committee or from this Congress, I favor the passage of this resolution and shall stand for the enforcement of the law it continues. If the committee and the House will not amend the law, the country should not tolerate further impairment of it through failure of enforcement on the claim that it is bad.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker, it is a thankless, and, I am inclined to think, a fruitless task, that I have assumed in rising to oppose this bill. I shall not trouble the House with criticism of any particular feature of it. I am opposed to the whole principle of it. I do not favor any restriction of immigration except to exclude the vicious, the diseased, or the imbecile. I do not think this measure any more objectionable than any other that could be devised having for its object reversal of the policy with respect to immigration which this country has pursued uninterruptedly ever since its discovery by Columbus. Whether a lower or a higher percentage of foreigners be admitted does not seriously affect the principle involved. Either admission to this country should be free, with the exceptions already stated, or it should be refused altogether. I think attempts to determine qualifications for admission by literary tests are perhaps the most preposterous, if not the most vicious, of all.

What we need in this country is all the effective labor we can possibly obtain. Only by the toil of human hands can the soil, however rich in natural resources, be made the theater of plenty. The prime necessity of the country is not linguists, but laborers. I do not think a glib tongue, even though it be glib in many languages, is half as good a passport for admission as a calloused hand well used to labor. Above all, the House should consider carefully the whole relation of immigration to industry and to citizenship before this first step is taken toward consummating the very grave change in our traditional policy, which the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] foreshadows. I do not think anyone will question that immigration should either be forbidden or it should be allowed. If it be desirable to restrict it, as the gentleman from Washington contends, why would it not be still more desirable to prohibit it? When it is prohibited we will, with respect to foreign intercourse, be in the position formerly occupied by Tibet and Korea, and by Japan when Commodore Perry forced open her ports 70 years ago. Is such a position desirable for the United States? Will it be—can it be—advantageous to us?

Mr. Speaker, I am not speaking for the people of any other country in the world, but solely for the people of this country. I am not appealing to the House for any measure of charity or forbearance or good will to the world at large, but I am appealing for some common sense in dealing with a question of the highest interest to these United States.

I stated here some time ago, and I repeat it now for the purpose of emphasizing what will follow, that nothing so valuable can enter a port of the United States as a pair of hands directed by a will to exercise them in cultivating our soil.

Mr. CABLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCKRAN. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CABLE. Do we at the present time need more hands in this country?

Mr. COCKRAN. We do.

Since all wealth must be produced by labor, it surely must be self-evident that nothing so valuable can come to us from foreign countries—nothing that can contribute so much to the growth and prosperity of this country—as immigrants eager to cultivate our soil. I pointed out that it is impossible for any man to perform labor of any kind without creating employment for others. My friend [Mr. CABLE] is under the delusion which results from disregarding the warning of Bagehot; in economics always distrust the obvious. Evidently he believes that every foreigner who enters this country can find employment only by displacing some one already here from his theater of labor. But nothing is further from the truth. For how can anyone take a ton of coal from the bosom of the earth without giving employment to others, in transporting it to factories where still others utilize it in manufacture? How can any man harvest a field of wheat without giving employment to others, in transporting it to the mill, in making it into flour, and to others still in making it into bread and distributing it among those who need it? And how can all this be done without increasing the volume of commodities available for support of human existence, and thus reducing the cost of living to everybody?

In the condition now confronting this country there is one feature that I call with special earnestness to the attention of the House. We are passing through a period of very grave depression, the gravest this country has ever faced.

Periods of depression have not been unknown in the past. And we never emerged from a period of depression except under the influence of increased immigration.

It has been the fashion to attribute the wonderful growth of this country in the late forties and in the early fifties to the discovery of gold in California. That was but an incident; it was not the source of that marvelous industrial development. The source of that enormous prosperity was chiefly the tide of immigration from Ireland, which sent a million pairs of human hands to cultivate fields that had lain waste for centuries, erecting towns, building sewers, and performing all that fundamental and useful labor without which higher skilled labor can not be employed at all. For I am sure it is unnecessary to remind gentlemen that skilled labor can not be exercised on the earth itself, but only on some product of the earth. And that raw product must be drawn from the earth by unskilled labor.

That no man can labor without creating a demand for other labor is an abstract proposition which even the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CABLE] would doubtless concede. But he may ask how does that tide of immigration work practically? How can the immigrant find employment here while hundreds of thousands are unemployed, although all of them are eager to work? The answer is simple.

The converse of the proposition, that no man can work without creating employment for other men, is equally true. No man can cease working in these basic forms of toil without depriving other men of work. If there is nobody to take coal from the mine, then there is no employment for men in transporting it to house or factory or in employing it for manufacture or comfort. If there is no one to carry bricks to the bricklayer, that highly skilled worker can not find employment. You could not pay a bricklayer $6 or $7 a day if he himself were forced to carry the bricks that he used. It is on a foundation of elemental unskilled labor that all other industry depends. And that unskilled labor in this country must be supplied by immigrants; America will not furnish it.

These unskilled laborers, coming from every port of the world, are the Helots of our industrial system, purchasing American citizenship by service in the field of industry, just as the Helots of old purchased Spartan citizenship by service in the field of battle.

They are the light marching forces of the great industrial army, ever ready and eager to seek a job wherever one can be found. The older elements of our population have become localized, and to a great extent specialized. The man who is a street paver is practically good for nothing else. In another field of labor he would be of decidedly inferior capacity. The man who carries the hod has special qualifications for that kind of work, but for no other. When, through a depression of industry, he is deprived of employment, he does not know where to turn for other work. Moreover, he has ties of family and neighborhood which make him reluctant to abandon places with which he is familiar to seek employment elsewhere. But the newly arrived immigrant has no associations here, no family ties, and no prejudices or preferences for or against any locality. He must work or starve, and he does not starve. He does not know enough about the devious ways of our civilization to begin life here by attempting to be a thief. He is the Janizary of the industrial forces, compelled by the very conditions of his being to go forth and look for a job wherever it can be found. When the search succeeds he can not fill that job without helping to provide jobs for others. With no other purpose than to gain his own support, he is yet stimulating industry throughout the whole country. And this hope of obtaining admission to the great opportunities of this country led the very flower of vigorous manhood throughout the world to fit themselves for a part in our industrial life. Wherever a young man was trained to skilled labor, aye, when he was unskilled, possessor merely of vigorous muscles, the one place, the El Dorado to which first his eyes and then his footsteps were turned, was America, the United States, seeking a chance to work, not to fight. No laborer can be employed unless he produces more than he consumes; otherwise there could be no profit in employing him. That surplus over the value of what the laborer receives for himself constitutes the compensation of capital, and necessarily becomes a contribution to the common fund, the general wealth through which industry is directed, its efficiency promoted, and its product increased. Let that steady tide of increased contribution to capital be shut out, as you are proposing now, and what must be the consequences? Our experience for the last four years affords the answer.

During the World War there was practically no immigration. What has been the result? A grave interruption of industry. We are suffering from it now. The swelling ranks of the unemployed are its dreary monument. How are the wheels of industry to be started again? Persons now living in cities will be slow to tear up their families and social roots—to change conditions with which they are familiar—to leave their families and neighborhoods seeking other tasks for which they are not fitted in localities with which they are unacquainted. The great mass of active, mobile labor, which immigration, and immigration alone, can afford is the force on which we must depend if our industry is to be revived. And that is the force which this measure restricts and which the policy underlying it will exclude altogether.

Mr. Speaker, we are at a point now where the truth of what I say will be tested. This resolution will be adopted. The existing law will be continued, followed no doubt by the more drastic measures which the report of the majority and the speech of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] indicate. Nothing that I or anyone else could say will avert these results. But I warn you that when this legislation will have excluded the tide of laborers who if actively employed during the last four years it must have stimulated industry to revived life and activity, and when under its operation the volume of labor will have been narrowed down to the present supply the industrial life of the country will long remain languishing in its present condition. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, I can not agree with my colleagues, who criticize this resolution with the expectation of voting for it.

The practical problem before us is simply this: Without the 3 per cent limitation plan, if this resolution continuing it should fail to pass and no other legislation should be enacted, the yearly immigration to this country would be between 1,200,000 and 1,500,000. With the present limitation it amounts to 350,000 a year. The conditions appear to be such that a general immigration bill can not be passed now in view of what else is to be done by this Congress, and while I never have considered any percentage plan as the proper system of regulating immigration, I am supporting this resolution because it means that the number will be limited to 350,000 a year.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON. In a moment. Some of our friends have brought up again the old talk about selective immigration, urging that the right of the immigrant to enter our shores is a matter that should be determined before he leaves his home port.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired.

Mr. WILSON. May I have one minute more?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I yield to the gentleman one minute more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized for one minute more.

Mr. WILSON. Whenever that question comes up the State Department tells us that the other countries take the position that it is an attempt to regulate their affairs and it is impossible to do that without treaty arrangements. That would be a proper system of immigration, but unless you get treaty arrangements to that effect it is simply out of the question to do it. So unless you are in favor of unlimited immigration the only thing we can do to bridge over the present emergency is to adopt the resolution and continue the 3 per cent plan. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, in concluding I should like to say that I have telegrams from the woman's department of the National Civic Federation of New York, from the Women Voters' League of Pennsylvania, and other organizations calling for the reenactment of the 3 per cent law, as well as telegrams from the American Legion, which calls for a three-year extension instead of one.

I want to say also that in spite of the argument of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] it must be apparent that if 1,000,000 laborers should come to the United States in the year beginning July 1 and every one of them should be able to speak the language in which our Constitution is written, we would not be able to care for them, and particularly if one-half of the million decided to remain in the city of New York.

Mr. COCKRAN. They would take care of themselves and produce a surplus, each one of them.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I have a letter here calling attention to 40,000 idle laborers in Denver, and letters of a similar nature from other places. I call attention to the paragraph in the report of the committee which shows that other countries have been obliged to shut down on immigration and why. I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. CABLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record in answer to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record on this measure.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record on this joint resolution. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PERLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I make a similar request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York makes a similar request. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOLK. I make a similar request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York makes a similar request. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROSSDALE. I make a similar request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York makes a similar request. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House suspend the rules and pass the joint resolution?

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman wants a roll call he had better ask for a division first.

Mr. SIEGEL. I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 123, noes 36.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. It is clear that there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors. The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members. As many as are in favor of the passage of the joint resolution will, as their names are called, vote "yea," those opposed "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 280, nays 36, answered "present" 1, not voting 113, as follows:

YEAS—280.

TERMS OF UNITED STATES COURTS IN SOUTHERN AND NORTHERN DISTRICTS OF WEST VIRGINIA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill S. 2810, to amend and reenact section 113 of chapter 5 of the Judicial Code of the United States, as amended and reenacted by an act approved the 22d day of August, 1914.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 113 of chapter 5 of the Judicial Code of the United States, as amended by the act approved August 22, 1914, be further amended and reenacted so the same shall read as follows:

"Sec. 113. The State of West Virginia is divided into two districts, to be known as the northern and southern districts of West Virginia. The northern district shall include the territory embraced on the 1st day of July, 1910, in the counties of Hancock, Brooke, Ohio, Marshall, Tyler, Pleasants, Woods, Wirt, Ritchie, Doddridge, Wetzel, Monongalia, Marion, Harrison, Lewis, Gilmer, Calhoun, Upshur, Barbour, Taylor, Preston, Tucker, Randolph, Pendleton, Hardy, Grant, Mineral, Hampshire, Morgan, Berkeley, and Jefferson, with the waters thereof. The terms of the district court for the northern district shall be held at Martinsburg on the first Tuesday in April and the third Tuesday in September; at Clarksburg on the second Tuesday in April and the first Tuesday in October; at Wheeling on the first Tuesday in May and the third Tuesday in October; at Elkins on the third Tuesday in June and the third Tuesday in November; at Parkersburg on the second Tuesday in January and the fourth Tuesday in May.

"The southern district shall include the territory embraced on the 1st day of July, 1910, in the counties of Jackson, Roane, Clay, Braxton, Webster, Nicholas, Pocahontas, Greenbrier, Fayette, Boone, Kanawha, Putnam, Mason, Cabell, Wayne, Lincoln, Logan, Mingo, Raleigh, Wyoming, McDowell, Mercer, Summers, and Monroe, with the waters thereof. The terms of the district court for the southern district shall be held at Charleston on the third Tuesday in April and the third Tuesday in November; at Huntington on the first Tuesday in March and the third Tuesday in September; at Bluefield on the first Tuesday in January and the third Tuesday in June; at Williamson on the first Tuesday in February; at Webster Springs on the fourth Tuesday in August; at Lewisburg on the first Tuesday in July: Provided, That a place for holding court at Webster Springs and Lewisburg shall be furnished free of cost to the United States; Provided further, That a place for holding court at Williamson shall be furnished free of cost to the United States by Mingo County until other provision is made therefor by law."

The following committee amendment was read:

Page 2, line 25, strike out the word "first" and insert the word "third."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GOODYKOONTZ, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

TO AMEND THE TRANSPORTATION ACT OF 1920.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill S. 621, an act to amend subdivision (c) of section 206 of the transportation act of 1920.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LONDON. Reserving the right to object, what is the object of this?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, when the transportation act was passed provision was made for limiting the time during which claims growing out of mistakes or errors on the part of the director general or his force of employees could be filed against the Railroad Administration. The period of time for the filing of straight overcharges expired March 1, 1921. This bill seeks to amend that law so as to permit the filing of claims for straight overcharges until September 1, 1922. A limitation in the transportation act was also placed upon the time for filing reparation claims against the Railroad Administration. These claims had to be filed within one year from the date of the passage of the act; that would be March 1, 1921. The claims are filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission. If the Interstate Commerce Commission makes an award and the director general chooses not to follow the award, suit must be brought by the shipper on the Interstate Commerce Commission award. Under subdivision (a) of section 206 of the transportation act suits of all kinds against the Railroad Administration must be commenced between the date of the passage of the act and March 1, 1922. The Interstate Commerce Commission has had so many of these reparation claims that they have been unable to decide them one way or the other, so that when March 1 next comes along they will have hundreds of claims undetermined. Later, if they make an award it will be impossible for the shipper to commence suit under the award. So the purpose of this bill is to extend the time for filing straight overcharge claims against the Railroad Administration until September 1, 1922, and to extend the time for filing suits on awards for reparation by the Interstate Commerce Commission until within one year following the date of the award.

Mr. LONDON. The second provision extends the time for filing the suit under the award of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Is that it?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes; under subdivision (a) of section 206.

Mr. LONDON. What is the nature of the reparation claims? By whom are those made?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. They are made by the shippers. They arise out of discrimination or mistakes made in drawing up the published tariff. They arise where there is a discrimination between the locality or where the rates are unjust and unreasonable.

Mr. LONDON. I thought those came under the head of straight overcharge claims.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. No. For example, suppose the rate from here to New York City on first-class merchandise is $2.50 per hundred; that is the published tariff rate by the Railroad Administration. But suppose the man is charged $3. That would be a straight overcharge, because it is in excess of the published tariff.

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. DUNBAR. I wish to give the gentleman a concrete illustration of the effect of the nonpassage of this bill. To the Bedford Stone Co., of Indiana, for transportation on cars under Government control, rates were increased from $2 to $18 for shipping charges. They made an appeal to the Interstate Commerce Commission for a rebate on what they thought to be an overcharge. The result has been that they have had awarded to them, so far as the provisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission extended, $33,000.

I understand that the Director of Railways objects to paying the $33,000, but is willing to pay $31,000, which the Bedford Stone Co. is not willing to accept. Two thousand dollars is in controversy. In order that the Bedford Stone Co. may be made secure in obtaining the rebate from the Government of $31,000 or $33,000, whichever amount it may finally be determined to be, this bill will enable them to secure the amount that is really due.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. It gives them a day in court that after March 1 they would not be entitled to.

Mr. DUNBAR. They would either have to accept the award before March 1 or have no day in court.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That subdivision (c) of section 206 of the transportation act, 1920, be, and the same hereby is, amended to read as follows:

"(c) Complaints praying for reparation on account of damage claimed to have been caused by reason of the collection or enforcement by or through the President during the period of Federal control of rates, fares, charges, classifications, regulations, or practices (including those applicable to interstate, foreign, or intrastate traffic) which were unjust, unreasonable, unjustly discriminatory, or unduly or unreasonably prejudicial, or otherwise in violation of the interstate commerce act, shall be filed with the commission within one year, or, if so claimed in respect of overcharges above the legal tariff charge, within two years after the termination of Federal control, against the agent designated by the President under subdivision (a), naming in the petition the railroad or system of transportation against which such complaint would have been brought if such railroad or system had not been under Federal control at the time the matter complained of took place. The commission is hereby given jurisdiction to hear and decide such complaints in the manner provided in the interstate commerce act, and all notices and orders in such proceedings shall be served upon the agent designated by the President under subdivision (a)."

With the following committee amendments:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert: "That subdivision (a) of section 206 of the transportation act, 1920, be, and the same hereby is, amended by striking out the period at the end thereof, substituting a semicolon, and adding the following:

"Except that actions to enforce awards made by the commission under the provisions of subdivision (c) against the agent so designated by the President may be brought within one year after the date of the commission's award."

SEC. 2. That subdivision (c) of said section 206 be, and the same hereby is, amended to read as follows:

"(c) Complaints praying for reparation on account of damage claimed to have been caused by reason of the collection or enforcement by or through the President during the period of Federal control of rates, fares, charges, classifications, regulations, or practices (including those applicable to interstate, foreign, or intrastate traffic) which were unjust, unreasonable, unjustly discriminatory, or unduly or unreasonably prejudicial, or otherwise in violation of the interstate commerce act, may be filed with the commission within one year, or, if so claimed in respect of overcharges above the legal tariff charge, within two years and six months, after the termination of Federal control, against the agent designated by the President, under subdivision (a), naming in the petition the railroad or system of transportation against which such complaint would have been brought if such railroad or system had not been under Federal control at the time the matter complained of took place. The commission is hereby given jurisdiction to hear and decide such complaints in the manner provided in the interstate commerce act, and all notices and orders in such proceedings shall be served upon the agent designated by the President under subdivision (a)."

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment to the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment to the amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. PADGETT: Page 3, line 17, after the word "charge," insert "or where complaints filed before any State commission and not decided at the time of the termination of Federal control."

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that is not germane to the amendment to which it is offered. Neither one of the subdivisions which are proposed to be amended deals with complaints before State commissions. I do not see how that could be germane to an amendment of two sections that do not deal with any such complaints. They deal only with complaints before Federal bodies.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I want to state what this amendment is intended to reach. To give a concrete statement, a furnace company in my district was shipping ore from a point in Tennessee to their furnace in another portion of the State. The published charge was 55 cents per hundred. The material was shipped at a point called Warners Switch, and the rate from there to the furnace was 55 cents. The railroad company, which was the Government, said, "We will bill this from Allens Creek," a place 2 miles farther, "and we will charge 65 cents." They continued to ship it from the same place, but they billed it from another place and added 10 cents. There was no change in the actual haul. These people filed their claims with the State commission, thinking that as it was an intrastate shipment it would be handled by the State commission. The State commission did not act upon it. They held it until after the time elapsed and then they said that the railroad company now had it.

The SPEAKER. Until after what time elapsed?

Mr. PADGETT. Until after the 1st of March last. Then the railroad company voluntarily reduced the freight charge back to 55 cents. The State commission then said that there was no use of deciding it at all, and there has been no decision by the State commission. The Interstate Commerce Commission here says that they have no jurisdiction because they waited until after the time, and this is to provide for cases where the mistake was made in filing the case before a State commission instead of presenting it originally to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman's amendment provides the time for filing claims with the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. PADGETT. That is it—that were filed before the State commissions, but not acted upon by the State commissions until it was too late to file them with the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. MANN. It does not extend the time for filing a claim before a State commission.

Mr. PADGETT. Not at all.

Mr. MANN. It merely extends the time for filing with the Interstate Commerce Commission certain cases other than those provided in the bill?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; and designated as those which were filed with a State commission. That is the purpose of the amendment and that is the language.

Mr. DUNBAR. Is it not the purpose also to extend the time for claims now being considered, the consideration of which will not be completed before the time expires?

Mr. PADGETT. As I understand it, it allows the claims to be filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission, all those claims which were erroneously filed with a State commission.

Mr. MANN. It is a claim for overcharge, is it not?

Mr. PADGETT. It is a claim for reparation.

Mr. MANN. If it is a reparation claim, it can be filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission, if this bill passes, without the gentleman's amendment. I do not see any necessity for the amendment.

Mr. PADGETT. It goes to that class referred to by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON] a while ago, when he spoke of a remedy for unjust charges. They charged 55 cents for hauling from the same point they have always hauled from, but billed it from a different point.

Mr. MANN. They make a claim for reparation or overcharge, one of the two, and either case is covered by the language of the bill now pending, it seems to me.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me clear that the gentleman's case is entirely covered by the bill, because this is to extend the time so that if he has not filed he may file.

Mr. MANN. That is the purpose of the bill. The purpose of the bill is to permit him to file regardless of whether he files with the State commission. If he did file with the State commission, he can file with the Interstate Commerce Commission; if he did not file with the State commission, he can file with the Interstate Commerce Commission. That is what the bill is for, and to put a particular case in may constitute a restriction on the wide latitude of the bill.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, so far as the point of order is concerned, after seeing the amendment and reading the context I do not think it is subject to the point of order, and I shall withdraw the point of order which I made.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended.

On motion of Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SPECIAL CANCELING STAMPS.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 10161) authorizing the use of special canceling stamps in certain post offices.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration to this bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby authorized and directed, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by him, to permit the use of special canceling stamps as follows: In the Richmond, Va., post office, dies bearing the words and figures "Virginia Historical Pageant, Richmond, Va., May 22 to 28, 1922." In the Louisville, Ky., post office, dies bearing the words and figures "Public Health Exposition, Louisville, Ky., February 1 to 9, 1922." In the Pasadena, Calif., post office, dies bearing the words and figures "Fiftieth Anniversary, Pasadena, All the Year 1924." Provided, That no permit shall be granted for a longer period than six months.

SEC. 2. That nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize the expenditure of any postal funds or appropriations either for the purchase of special dies or for furnishing or adapting canceling machines for the use of special dies.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Lines 8, 9, 10, and 11, page 1, strike out the words and figures "In the Louisville, Ky., post office, dies bearing the words and figures 'Public Health Exposition, Louisville, Kentucky, February 1 to 9, 1922,'" and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"In the Phoenix, Ariz., post office, dies bearing the words and figures 'Visit Phoenix, Arizona, April 24-29, United States Good Roads Week.'"

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.
The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the amendment just adopted insert the following:

"In the Fayetteville, Ark., post office, dies bearing the words and figures 'Semecentennial, University of Arkansas, June 10-14, 1922 (50 years of service).'"

"In the Hutchinson, Kans., post office, dies bearing the words and figures '50th anniversary, Hutchinson and Reno Counties, Kansas, State Fair, September 16-22, 1922.'"

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, in view of the amendment just adopted and the suggested amendment, whether it is the policy of the committee to authorize canceling stamps for all character of fairs that are held in all localities, small or large, of the country. If it is, why not pass a general law and not take up the time of the Congress with these chicken-feed proposals?

Mr. STEENERSON. I will say that the committee is considering that question, and this bill is an omnibus bill that does contain a limitation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why not pass a general bill authorizing the Postmaster General to furnish canceling stamps for all character of fairs that are held in various localities of the country?

Mr. STEENERSON. I say we will take up that question very soon. The department has authority—

Mr. MANN. Would the chairman of the committee be willing to permit the city of Milwaukee to have a canceling stamp on which were the words, "We want beer"?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will say that that would reflect the sentiment of 80 to 90 per cent of the citizens of Milwaukee [laughter], and not only Milwaukee but a large majority of the country. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEENERSON. We will decide that question—

Mr. STAFFORD. Give us a chance and we will demonstrate it to you and stop moonshining.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. STEENERSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ST. FRANCIS BARRACKS.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 2138) providing that the Government property known as the St. Francis Barracks, St. Augustine, Fla., be donated to the State of Florida for military purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, before the objection stage is passed, I would like to inquire whether there were any Government improvements on this property to be turned over to St. Augustine, Fla.?

Mr. SEARS. I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin there are 14 wooden buildings on this property. The property only contains about 3 acres of land and has been used by the State of Florida for many years by the adjutant general for military purposes. I have here a report showing that the Secretary of War says he has no objection to the transfer of these buildings, and further calls attention to the fact that the bill provides, following the suggestion of the Secretary of War, that the President at any time may revoke this transfer. The legislature of my State has appropriated $40,000, and is going to spend it on the remodeling of these buildings, and will also appropriate an additional amount if necessary.

Mr. MANN. Why is not the report of the Secretary of War contained in the report of the committee?

Mr. SEARS. I will read it.

Mr. MANN. I know; but why did not they print it in the report here?

Mr. SEARS. It is in print.

Mr. MANN. Where?

Mr. SEARS. We had it before the Military Affairs Committee, and they reported it out. It was not in print in this report, but it was in print in the Senate report.

Mr. MANN. My observation is generally when we ask for a report of one of the departments and they refuse to print it in their own report it is because they are afraid of it. It is just like the case we had up here the other day where I wanted to see a report of the War Department. I can understand why they left it out. It was distinctly and strongly adverse.

Mr. SEARS. If my friend will yield, it was printed.

Mr. MANN. Where?

Mr. SEARS. In the Senate report.

Mr. MANN. In the Senate report?

Mr. SEARS. Which was before the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MANN. My friend from Florida may expect to go to the Senate some time. I am quite willing to rely on what is before the House, but I do not see that I am obliged to trot over to the Senate to find out what I may before the bill comes before the House.

Mr. SEARS. I realize that. The Military Affairs Committee of the House did not think it necessary to reprint it, and that is the only explanation I can give.

Mr. MANN. I expect that the Committee on Military Affairs of the House never saw the report, although some gentleman has his name attached to it, by a subclerk, probably, somewhere, who did not know anything about it.

Mr. CLOUSE. Will the gentleman from Florida yield for a question?

Mr. SEARS. Yes.

Mr. CLOUSE. Under the provisions of this bill it seems to me the United States Government is donating to the State of Florida this particular property with the provision that upon the demand of the President on the governor of the State the possession of the property shall revert. Now, then, no title passes to the State of Florida. I wonder who is supposed to keep the property in repair during the time that the State of Florida is using it?

Mr. SEARS. I have just stated that our legislature has already appropriated $40,000 to keep this up, and will continue to keep it up, and I only accept the bill in this form because I am satisfied no President would do any State an injustice.

Mr. CLOUSE. That appropriation is available?

Mr. SEARS. It is available now and waiting for the passage of this bill.

I would like also to call your attention to the fact that the State of Florida, as did, perhaps, some other States during the last war, turned over Camp Johnson with all of its buildings; also the armory in Jacksonville, and all our armories in Florida, where needed, to the Government without cost, and did not ask the Government for a single dollar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WALSH). Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 2138) providing that the Government property known as the St. Francis Barracks, at St. Augustine, Fla., be donated to the State of Florida for military purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Government buildings and the land connected therewith, known as St. Francis Barracks, at St. Augustine, Fla., be, and the same is hereby, donated to the State of Florida, to be held by said State and used for military purposes, subject to the following express condition that upon notice in writing by the President of the United States to the governor of the State of Florida that the United States has need for said property, this grant shall cease and determine and title to said lands and all improvements thereon shall immediately revert to the United States.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SEARS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXCHANGE OF SITES FOR GOVERNMENT BUILDINGS, NEW YORK CITY.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was House joint resolution 257, to appoint a commission for the exchange of sites for a post-office and courthouse building at New York between the Federal Government and the officials of the city of New York.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to get some information from some one.

Mr. ROSSDALE. I believe I can furnish the gentleman with the information.

Mr. MANN. I do not believe the gentleman can, but I would like to have him answer the question, if possible. I would like to ask some members of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds why they propose an amendment and insist on the appointment of a commission that knows nothing itself? Now, can the gentleman from New York answer that?

Mr. ROSSDALE. I think I can answer it, and I hope I may convince the gentleman from Illinois. This commission is to consist of five Cabinet members, to be appointed by the President.

Mr. MANN. The resolution itself appoints them.

Mr. ROSSDALE. I know. These five Cabinet members, however, are to represent the departments that require the space in these proposed buildings, and the administrations of their departments are concerned in this measure.

Mr. MANN. Yes; and the gentleman knows that not one of them will ever look at these sites—

Mr. ROSSDALE. Their representatives will.

Mr. MANN (continuing). Unless they want a nice trip over to New York, which they can get anyhow, if they want it, and we will never know who it is that recommends the exchange. It will be some subordinate official somewhere. Instead of appointing a commission the personnel of which is known, and which has the responsibility of doing something itself and can be held liable for what it does or does not do, the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds has proposed that there be five Cabinet officers appointed. If I thought they were going to give it attention themselves, I certainly would not be in favor of passing such a bill, because they have something better to do. They are going to appoint some one, and you do not know who it is; at least, I do not know, though the gentleman may. The country does not know who it is going to be. There is no responsibility. I do not like it.

Mr. ROSSDALE. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that when I first proposed this measure I provided for a commission of three, and that this change was suggested by the Postmaster General himself.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the Postmaster General has not been worth a 5-cent piece since he has been Postmaster General. He does not know anything about the Post Office Department; and, for one, I am mighty glad he is getting out of it. His only object has been to be extravagant in his own personal relations with the Government. Long-distance telephoning is his main, long suit. I am only speaking of his official duties. And I can say this, having no postmaster to be appointed.

Mr. ROSSDALE. I have not any, either.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield for a personal interpretation of the law? I understand the way the bill reads it would be the duty of the five members of the Cabinet to attend to the matter personally. Is that not the legal construction of it?

Mr. MANN. Of course, that is the legal construction; but that would not be the way it would be done, although I do not know whether that is the legal construction or not.

Mr. LONDON. When a commission of five members are appointed they can not delegate their powers to anybody else?

Mr. ROSSDALE. They do it and always have done it.

Mr. MANN. The trouble would be as it has always been ever since I have been here. We create a good deal of excitement, and there would be a good many charges made, true or false. I do think when we exchange valuable property over in New York City we ought to have somebody appointed who can give it attention and not appoint a clerk who wants to have a joy ride over to New York, and then go over there and do what they tell him to do.

Mr. ROSSDALE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. ROSSDALE. I wanted to say that I do not think there will ever enter any scandal into this thing, because it is an open-and-shut proposition, without any attempt at gain. The city of New York at the present time really has title to the present site, but it does not want to take that site away from the Federal Government in that way; instead, it offers in the new civic center which they have laid out at tremendous cost—I should say at a cost of many millions of dollars—all the land that the Federal Government may need and want for one or more buildings as the Federal Government may require without the outlay of a single cent. No city could do more. At the present time the Federal Government is expending in rentals in the city of New York approximately $2,500,000 per annum. We have an example. In a single building rented within the last year the Government agrees to pay $400,000 per annum.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman say that the city of New York owns this post-office site? That is an easy question to answer. Do they own it or not?

Mr. ROSSDALE. In my opinion, they do, but they do not want to acquire it in that way. They want to give the Federal Government another site in exchange. If the gentleman will allow me, I will read an extract from the original deed.

Mr. MANN. Then, it is a very important matter, as to who owns the property.

Mr. ROSSDALE. The city does not want take it that way. Mr. MANN. I do not know about that. If the city of New York has its Representative on the floor, and he says it owns a site, it is certain that the city is not going to give away ground for a site that it now owns.

Mr. ROSSDALE. The city of New York in 1867 deeded the present site for a nominal consideration on the condition that that site would be used for post-office purposes only, and that in the event it was used otherwise the title would automatically revert back to the city of New York. Everybody in the city of New York knows that the Federal Government has used that site for housing various Federal bureaus, and that if at the present time the city desired to, it could have automatically closed in on the Federal Government and taken the land back.

Mr. MANN. What is this property used for?

Mr. ROSSDALE. The old building is there now.

Mr. MANN. What is it used for?

Mr. ROSSDALE. It is used for all kinds of purposes.

Mr. MANN. Is it used for a grocery store or a saloon? [Laughter.]

Mr. ROSSDALE. It is used for a post office and a courthouse and for other Federal bureaus. A single Federal bureau housed in that building invalidates the title of the Federal Government to it. But New York City does not want to do that. New York City is offering the Federal Government the best site in the city of New York, a site that has cost the city millions of dollars. They are establishing a civic center there, and there are blocks and blocks that have been cleared off; and the city is now offering to the Federal Government the opportunity to acquire the land it needs.

Mr. MANN. If that offer is in that shape, why should we provide by act of Congress an exchange for a new site? These people can not make the deed for the site.

Mr. ROSSDALE. Oh, yes; they would have the authority to exchange, following the original form, whereby the site was originally acquired.

Mr. MANN. I do not think they would have the right under this bill to convey the title.

Mr. ROSSDALE. I have here a copy of the law creating that commission, and I could give it to the gentleman. That is how the present site was acquired, and if the present site was acquired in that way, why could not an exchange of sites also be effected in that way?

Mr. MANN. Somebody has to convey the title to the United States. Somebody has to make the conveyance. I do not know in what department the title rests. Probably it rests in the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. ROSSDALE. There was an act of Congress that created the original commission that acquired the site.

Mr. MANN. We can buy a site and have the title conveyed to the United States without any trouble.

Mr. ROSSDALE. I grant that the gentleman wants to be fair. Would it be cheaper for the Federal Government to buy a site or to get it for nothing?

Mr. MANN. This commission probably would have authority to accept the title to the new site. Would it have authority to convey the title to the old site?

Mr. ROSSDALE. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Where is that given?

Mr. ROSSDALE. If the gentleman will read the bill, he will understand.

Mr. MANN. I have read the bill oftener than the gentleman has, and could almost give it by heart.

Mr. ROSSDALE. There are the experts in the department that favor it.

Mr. MANN. There are no experts in the department.

Mr. ROSSDALE. I allow that the gentleman wants to be fair, and—

Mr. MANN. That is unnecessary to remark. If the gentleman would prepare himself and know what the bill provides, it would be much better.

Mr. ROSSDALE. I would be glad to enlighten the gentleman on any question he desires to ask me.

Mr. MANN. Who is going to convey the title?

Mr. ROSSDALE. This proposed commission.

Mr. MANN. Well, I dare say they will not, and can not.

Mr. ROSSDALE. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, this resolution provides for a commission to exchange sites in the city of New York between the Federal Government and the city of New York. This commission is to be appointed by the President and is to consist of representatives of the five branches of the Government chiefly concerned in housing their various departments and bureaus in that city, namely, the Post Office Department, the Treasury Department, the Department of Justice, the Department of Labor, and the Department of Commerce. The resolution empowers the commission to effect an exchange of sites for a building or buildings which shall house a great down-town post office, courtrooms, and offices for the various Federal agencies and bureaus that are now scattered all over the city of New York in leased buildings at prohibitive rental cost to the Government.

The conditions applying to the space requirements of the Federal Government in New York City are so distressing as to interfere with and prevent the proper functioning of the various Government agencies located in that city. The situation is so acute that it came before the Cabinet for solution and the Cabinet and the President agreed upon and recommended the enactment of this resolution to enable the Government to acquire by exchange the land which is needed to build upon and which the city magnanimously offers the Government for this purpose.

The city of New York, by resolution of the board of aldermen, which is the authoritative body having this matter in hand, passed a resolution creating a commission consisting of the mayor and the comptroller of the city and the president of the Borough of Manhattan, with authority to exchange a part of the land which the city had set aside for a great civic center for the plot of ground known as the old post-office building site. The city offers to deed to the Government a part of the civic center site for one or more buildings, as the Government may determine, and it now remains for Congress to create a Federal commission to arrange with the city commission for the exchange. On the old site is the old post-office building, which was formerly the general post office and Federal court building. At present it houses the United States district attorney's offices, some United States courts, and other Federal bureaus. There is also a branch post office there known as City Hall Station, for the transaction of ordinary postal business as in other local branch stations, and it is also a concentration point for the dumping of enormous quantities of mail matter which is collected at various other branch stations and brought there for sorting and distribution to all parts of the country and elsewhere throughout the world. It is an antiquated old pile of granite in form like an exaggerated mausoleum, inadequate for present needs and impossible of alteration.

It was originally designed as a combination post-office and courthouse building and was erected in 1870. The site was deeded in 1867 by the city of New York to the Federal Government for the nominal sum of $500,000, conditional that the building to be erected upon it be used exclusively for a post office and Federal courthouse. The Government, however, violated this agreement, for it has housed in it various other Federal departments and agencies for many years, and in the opinion of those qualified to judge the title to this plot of ground has long ago reverted to the city. The following extract from the deed will confirm this opinion among Members of the House:

EXTRACT.

Upon the express condition, however, that the premises above described and every part and parcel thereof and any building that may be erected thereon shall at all times thereafter be used exclusively as and for a post office and courthouse for the United States of America and for no other purpose whatever. And upon the further condition that if the said premises shall at any time or times cease to be used for the purposes above limited, or for some one of them, or if the same shall be used for any other purposes than those above specified, the said premises hereby conveyed and all right, title, estate, and interest therein shall revert to and be reinvested in the said parties of the first part and their successors and assigns.

Although the Government's title is clouded, the attitude of the city is extremely fair; it does not want to exercise its legal rights, however desirous it is to secure the return of this site, and offers in exchange another site just north of the magnificent new municipal building which is about four blocks north of the old post-office site. Here the city has cleared off a large area for the establishment of a civic center at an expenditure of many millions of dollars. Here it is building its thirty-million-dollar courthouse, and here it offers a site in exchange for the old, free of cost, with as much area of ground as the Government may need for the erection of either one or more buildings as the proposed Federal commission may determine.

The advantages accruing to the Government from the proposed exchange are manifold and it is important that this exchange be effected now while the land is available and not built upon. Ground to build upon must be acquired by the Government and Uncle Sam will save millions of dollars by exchanging rather than purchasing land. The old site can not be sold and is limited to post-office and courthouse uses. We must house all the other Federal agencies somewhere. Besides, the old site is small in area, and its triangular flat-iron shape is unsuitable for the building requirements of the Government.

How urgently pressing is the need for additional post-office space may be seen in the reports of the Joint Postal Commission of the House and Senate. New York City has been very aptly termed the neck of the postal bottle for the whole of the United States. The mails to and from all points in the United States and from every corner and place in the world converge here and must pass through the neck of this postal bottle. It is not local New York City mails alone that are concerned. It is the mails for every city, every village—yes, and every farm—throughout the country; all pass here for distribution. Hamper and delay them in New York because of lack of space to properly handle them and you delay the mail of everyone, everywhere.

The Government is at present paying approximately a million dollars per annum rentals for its various scattered bureaus and departments in the city of New York, and the crowded conditions of some of these bureaus due to lack of space is a shame and a disgrace. Even some of our Federal courts are now in rented office buildings. We can total the cost of the high rentals we pay for this, but we can not total the cost of the wastage resulting from the loss by reason of the improper functioning of these various Federal agencies due to lack of space.

The approximate rental costs I have stated are exclusive of those paid by the Post Office Department. Here we have a worse example of waste. We pay enormous sums for rentals of buildings from private owners and contractors for post-office purposes. Only recently we leased the Varick Street Post Office Station at an annual rental of $400,000 per annum. This had to be done to relieve the congestion of mails in the very district embraced by the proposed exchange of sites. And the Post Office Department frankly admits it is only a temporary and insufficient relief. Just think of it—$400,000 per annum for a single rented branch post office station. Something should and must be done to save these rental costs to the Federal Government.

To remedy this situation the Government must eventually build its own building or buildings and it must first secure the land upon which it intends to build. This resolution carries no appropriation with it, for it is but a preliminary to provide the instrument, which is a commission to effect the exchange of sites wherewith to secure the ground needed for these purposes.

It is important that Members of Congress know that the original deed was given by the city for a nominal consideration, shortly after the close of the Civil War in a spirit of helpfulness to our then impoverished Government. The site is an historic spot crowded with incidents and happenings of the Revolutionary War. The building covers the spot where the original Liberty Pole was erected by the Liberty Boys in Revolutionary days. Directly across is old St. Paul's Church and in the churchyard lie the patriots of those days; and here Washington worshipped.

It was originally a part of City Hall Park and is hallowed ground, hallowed with memories of the Revolution, of Nathan Hale, of the old British prison, where suffered and died martyred Continental soldiers. The people of New York have always regretted giving away that site and resented the erection of that architectural monstrosity on that spot. They want to restore it to park purposes and keep it as a shrine for patriotic Americans, and serve as a much-needed breathing spot in that overcrowded section of old New York.

It is not all sentiment, however, that inspires the city in its willingness to exchange sites. It combines sentiment and public spirit with common business sense—for the mutual interest of the city and of the country, for we in New York pay a large part of all Federal taxes. Seeing the deplorable conditions that prevail in the housing of the Federal courts and bureaus and the inadequate post office facilities, the great city of New York has taken the lead in its desire to remedy these conditions, and it generously offers this exchange of sites that Uncle Sam may save millions in annual rentals and lessen the tax bill for us all.

The Joint Postal Commission has recommended that the old building be torn down and that a new building be erected. The Postmaster General, the President's Cabinet, and the President all urge that this exchange of sites be effected and that the resolution be passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Postmaster General shall appoint a commission consisting of three officials, who shall have authority to exchange the land known as the old post-office site in the city of New York for other land to be deeded by the city of New York in exchange for such site; that this commission shall confer and arrange with the authorized committee of the board of estimate of the city of New York, consisting of the mayor, comptroller, and president of the Borough of Manhattan.

With committee amendments, as follows:

On page 1, line 3, strike out the words "Postmaster General" and insert "President of the United States," and in line 4 strike out the words "consisting of three officials" and insert "of five, consisting of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Attorney General, the Postmaster General, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Labor."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I want to debate the committee amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the policy of creating commissions composed of five members of the Cabinet as a general policy in connection with such a small and relatively unimportant measure. There may be times when it is desirable for such a commission, perhaps, as that of settling and adjusting the debt of other countries to this country. But generally speaking we ought not to pursue the policy of creating commissions composed of Cabinet officers. These Cabinet members have their own duties to perform, and they are selected because of their special fitness to perform the particular duties which are imposed upon them. Now, when we name five Cabinet members to constitute a commission we are not only creating a commission which ordinarily would not be a good one to carry out some particular function of this kind, but we are also interfering with the duties of the different Cabinet members. The Postmaster General has something to do besides attending the meetings of such a commission.

Mr. MANN. He ought to have.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. And notwithstanding the opinion expressed by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] I wish to say that in my opinion the present Postmaster General has performed the duties of his office as well as any Postmaster General in the Cabinet of any President. [Applause.] Of course Mr. Hays has had to deal more than any other Cabinet officer with the political questions of this administration. He has had to deal with the question of selecting postmasters, which is always a difficult and trying task. Notwithstanding the criticism of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, Mr. Hays has brought to that office his wonderful executive ability and has carried out the functions of that office in such a manner as to receive the commendation not only of the members of his party but of the country generally.

Will H. Hays is a remarkable man, energetic, industrious, courageous, and efficient. He brought to the performance of his duties as Postmaster General a wide experience in the conduct of affairs, a genial personality, and a character peculiarly fitted for carrying on the work. The department spends six hundred millions annually. It conducts a business with an annual turnover of over three thousand millions. The department has over 300,000 employees in the field and departmental service. The parcel post handles more than two and a half billion packages annually. The scope of the work is tremendous.

It must be gratifying to Postmaster General Hays to know that his efficient management of postal affairs has the hearty commendation of the great body of the public to whom good postal service means so much. A letter may seem unimportant in itself, but frequently to the sender and to the addressee it is of vast importance. Since he has been at the head of this great department Mr. Hays has seemed to stress the importance of good service to the public which pays the bill.

An editorial in the Review of Reviews in speaking of Mr. Hays says:

WILL HAYS AND THE POSTAL SERVICE.

A two-day meeting of the New York Academy of Political Science was held last month, its five sessions being devoted to the general subject of industrial relations under present conditions in the United States. The proceedings were of exceptional interest, and will soon be published in a volume. One of the sessions was devoted to the topic of governmental employment, whether National, State, or local. Two speakers, testifying from personal knowledge, paid high tribute to the Hon. Will H. Hays, Postmaster General, for the efforts he has been making to improve the Postal Service by considering the welfare of the men and women whom the Government employs. There are about 325,000 of these postal employees. Their efforts bring Uncle Sam closer to the people than any other agency. After all, the post office is our foremost mechanism for the spread of culture and for the unifying of our citizenship. It comes nearer to performing the kindly offices of a national Santa Claus in the month of December than any or all other agencies. In improving the morale of the Postal Service Mr. Hays is also increasing its efficiency.

Mr. Hays has taken a real interest in the welfare of the postal employees, whom he regards as his coworkers. A new spirit has been infused by him into the work of the department and the relations of the men in the service to the welfare of the department.

He is soon to leave the Government service. When he leaves he will take with him the gratitude of the Republic for his faithful service and the well-wishes of a host of friends in Washington and elsewhere who have learned to love him for his sympathetic kindness and to respect him for his keen, brilliant intellect and persevering devotion to his public duties.

Now, to recur to the question of putting five Cabinet members on a commission, I do not think it ought to be done, because it interferes with their official duties. Of course, if we are going to create the commission we ought not to say that the President appoints it. If we are going to have that commission, we ought to say that we create it. I do not think the committee amendment ought to be agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. May we not properly agree to the first amendment, which substitutes the President for the Postmaster General, and disagree to the second committee amendment, which provides for the appointment of five Cabinet officers instead of three officials who would have to be named?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes; I think it would be preferable to have the President appoint the commission. I think that would be a desirable thing.

Mr. ROSSDALE. That is satisfactory to me.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the gentleman think it would be better to name three officials? If we authorize their appointment, would it not be necessary to have them confirmed by the Senate?

Mr. MANN. No.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why not name the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Postmaster General?

Mr. MANN. Let somebody be appointed who will do the work. I do not know what the President would do. Let the President appoint three officials. They do not have to be confirmed by the Senate unless that is so provided.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I think it would be better for the first committee amendment to be agreed to and for the second committee amendment to be disagreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the first committee amendment.

The first committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the second committee amendment.

The second committee amendment was rejected.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 1, line 10, after the word "site" insert "and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and empowered to make the necessary deeds of conveyance of the property now owned by the Government upon the exchange of said respective properties."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, when I went over this bill I took occasion to examine the statutes to see whether there was any authorized officer of the Government who is empowered to make conveyances of Government property. I could not find any such authorization in the Revised Statutes. I have just called up the Solicitor of the Treasury Department, who has charge of the conveyances of all Government property and the keeping of all deeds to Government property, and he informs me that there is no such statute—that when the Government does convey property there is authorization carried in the act. I do not think there would be any authority on the part of any Government official, even the President of the United States, to convey the old post-office site without the adoption of this amendment or a similar one. Therefore I ask for its adoption.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Would not the enactment of the statute accomplish the purpose without any specific deed of conveyance? Would not the statute transfer the title?

Mr. STAFFORD. No; I think under this act the officials to be appointed will be authorized only to enter into executory contracts of sale and exchange of the property, and that it would require some subsequent act of Congress delegating authority to some executive officer to make the necessary deed of the Government property so as to show the chain of title.

Mr. MANN. We could pass the title by act of Congress, but this does not purport to.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that I was not discussing this particular bill, but the general question which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr.

STAFFORD] has raised. I had supposed that a statute would operate to pass title if the statute was so drawn.

Mr. STAFFORD. The act itself would be the evidence of the conveyance, but in this instance we are not conveying the title; the property is not described, and we are only authorizing the commission to arrange an exchange. My amendment is to authorize some executive officer to execute the deed.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. The gentleman admits that it would be possible to frame a bill so that it would convey the title?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; but, as the gentleman from Illinois said, the property to be exchanged is not described in the bill, and if that was the case there would be no authorization for the execution of the deed.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Let the amendment be again read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ROSSDALE, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

TO CONTINUE THE MILITARY STATUS OF DESERTERS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 125) to continue the military status of persons deserting the military or naval service during the World War, and the amenability to trial of those persons who failed to comply with the terms of section 5 of the selective service law.

The Clerk read the title to the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. LONDON. I object.

BUILDINGS OF THE AMERICAN RED CROSS, WASHINGTON, D. C.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was S. J. Res. 43, a joint resolution to grant authority to continue the use of the temporary buildings of the American Red Cross headquarters in the city of Washington, D. C.

The Clerk read the title.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that that resolution be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to pass over the resolution without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MEMORIAL TO JEANNE D'ARC.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was S. J. Res. 108, a joint resolution authorizing the erection on public grounds in the city of Washington, D. C., of a memorial to Jeanne d'Arc.

The Clerk read the title.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request as I did to the previous resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CLOTHING TO EX-SERVICE MEN WHILE HOSPITAL PATIENTS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was H. J. Res. 221, directing the Secretary of War to furnish clothing to ex-service men while patients in Public Health Service hospitals.

The Clerk read the title.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object—

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask that this resolution be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. MANN. I think the resolution ought to be re-formed.

Mr. RAYBURN. When the resolution was introduced it was properly a resolution for the Committee on Military Affairs, but after they got through with it it was not a resolution for that committee at all, but for the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. My colleague, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], has some amendment that he wishes to offer, but he is away this afternoon.

Mr. MANN. It may be that some relief ought to be granted, but the present resolution goes too far.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the resolution be passed without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DISCHARGE CERTIFICATES.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 9717) to amend an act [Public No. 219] approved July 1, 1902, authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish discharge certificates.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, as I understand this measure it only changes existing law to the extent of granting the privilege to the next of kin of a deceased soldier to entitle him to a certificate of discharge. My query is, which I wish to direct to some member of the Committee on Military Affairs, how many such certificates may be expected? The next of kin may be a large class. It does not limit it to any one individual; it may mean several. Are all the members under this classification of next of kin privileged to call on The Adjutant General for a certificate of discharge upon his showing that the original certificate of discharge is lost?

Mr. MCKENZIE. That was not the understanding of the Committee on Military Affairs. It means that there can be one certificate.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; but heretofore a certificate could only be issued to the soldier in interest, or his widow in case the soldier was deceased. Now you are opening the privilege to a class and not restricting it.

Mr. MANN. This is only an authority; it is not a direction.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not think it was the intention to grant the privilege promiscuously for everyone who was next of kin.

Mr. MCKENZIE. This does not obligate the Government in any way.

Mr. CLOUSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. CLOUSE. I am impressed with the suggestion of the gentleman from Wisconsin, and I want to ask the chairman of the committee if the next of kin were entitled to these certificates of discharge if two of equal relation should apply at the same time to the Secretary of War what he would do?

Mr. MCKENZIE. The same rule would apply that it does to the issue of letters of administration, I suppose—the first one would get the certificate.

Mr. CLOUSE. But suppose they both applied at the same time.

Mr. MANN. They would probably both die while the Secretary of War was determining which one should have it. [Laughter.]

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That an act to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish certificates of discharge, approved July 1, 1902, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"That the Secretary of War shall be authorized to furnish to such officer or enlisted man, or to the widow of such officer or enlisted man, or to the next of kin of such officer or enlisted man, a certificate of discharge to be indelibly marked so that it may be known as a certificate in lieu of a lost or destroyed discharge certificate."

The following committee amendment was read:

On line 6, after the word "That," insert the following: "Whenever satisfactory proof shall be furnished to the War Department that any officer or enlisted man who has been or shall hereafter be honorably discharged from the military service of the United States has lost his certificate of discharge, or the same has been destroyed without his privity or procurement.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MANN: Strike out "an act to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish certificates of discharge," and insert "the act entitled 'An act to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish certificates in lieu of lost or destroyed discharges.'"

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MANN, the title of the bill was amended to read as follows:

To amend the act entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish certificates in lieu of lost or destroyed discharges," approved July 1, 1902.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

By unanimous consent, Mr. SANDERS of Indiana was granted leave to extend and revise his remarks in the RECORD on the resolution appointing a commission of Cabinet officers for the exchange of sites for a post office, etc., in New York City.

SEQUOIA NATIONAL PARK.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 7452) to add certain lands to the Sequoia National Park, Calif., and to change the name of said park to Roosevelt-Sequoia National Park.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?
There was no objection.

ISSUANCE OF MEDALS OF HONOR, ETC.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 10297) to extend the limitations of time upon the issuance of medals of honor, distinguished service crosses, and distinguished service medals to persons who served in the Army of the United States during the World War.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk reported the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the eighth paragraph under the caption "Medals of honor, distinguished service crosses, and distinguished service medals," Army appropriation act approved July 9, 1918, to the extent that it establishes limitations of time as a condition of issuance or a condition precedent to issuance of such medals and crosses to persons, or the representatives of deceased persons, who served in the Army of the United States from April 7, 1917, to November 11, 1918, inclusive, is amended so as to extend such respective limitations for a period of one year from and after the approval of this act.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. We have another instance here of a bill reported from the Committee on Military Affairs without any recommendation, so far as the report is concerned, from the War Department. Can any member of the Committee on Military Affairs inform the House whether this bill meets with the approval of the War Department, and whether they support the argument mentioned in the report that there are instances where persons have not had time to have these questions of award gone over by the War Department?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit me, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FROTHINGHAM] who introduced this bill, and who to-day is detained from the House because he is ill in bed, introduced a bill some time ago on this subject which, I think, provided for an extension for five years. I suppose the gentleman from Wisconsin understands that no award could be given for heroic service in the war since some time in November last, under the three-year limitation contained in the law. The original bill provided an extension of time for five years, if I remember correctly. The War Department did not think there should be such a long extension, nor did the Committee on Military Affairs. That bill was reported to the House in an amended form, but in such form that it accomplished nothing at all. I discussed the matter with the gentleman from Massachusetts. He took it up with the War Department, which first insisted that the original bill as reported with the committee amendment was sufficient, when, in fact, it did nothing except reiterate words; and the gentleman from Massachusetts drew this bill, which is in accordance with the recommendations of the War Department.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 9659 on the same subject be laid upon the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?
There was no objection.

GENERAL FEDERATION OF WOMEN'S CLUBS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill H. R. 9979, to amend an act entitled "An act granting a charter to the General Federation of Women's Clubs."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2 of the act entitled "An act granting a charter to the General Federation of Women's Clubs," approved March 3, 1901, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows: "Sec. 2. That the said corporation is authorized to acquire, by devise, bequest, or otherwise, hold, purchase, and convey such real and personal estate as shall or may be required for the purpose of its incorporation not exceeding $500,000, with authority in said corporation, should it be by it deemed necessary so to do, to mortgage or otherwise encumber the real estate which it may hereafter own or acquire and may give therefor such evidences of indebtedness as such corporation may decide upon."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend in line 10 by striking out the word "purpose" in the singular, and by inserting the word "purposes" in the plural.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 10, strike out the word "purpose" and insert in lieu thereof the word "purposes."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

HOUSING FOR WAR NEEDS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill H. R. 9597, to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the President to provide housing for war needs," approved May 16, 1918.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

RELIEF OF CERTAIN PERSONS IN MINNESOTA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill H. R. 10007, for the relief of certain persons to whom, or to their predecessors, patents were issued to public lands in the State of Minnesota under an erroneous survey made in 1876.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, are there any adverse claimants on this property which is sought to be resurveyed; and if so, are their rights protected under the bill as drawn?

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Speaker, at the present time, so far as I have been informed, there are no adverse claimants. Adverse claimants have appeared in times past, but in lawsuits tried in the State courts of Minnesota the rights of those claimants have always been declared null and void. The bill, however, in the latter part of section 1, does protect the rights of such adverse claimants as there may be in the following language:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall have the effect of defeating the rights of any other person or persons which may have attached to such lands or any part thereof.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTNESS. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand the facts of this case, there was a mistake made in the original survey in not including certain lands which the Government surveyed?

Mr. BURTNESS. That is possibly questionable. The original survey, made in 1876, shows quite a large lake—in fact, rather a large lake as compared with what the lake is now. The department for a great many years refused to recognize the possibility of any mistake having been made, but recently they caused a resurvey to be made, and I have this blue print which I hold here, which will give a very good idea of the situation. This part here [indicating] shows the diminished lake, and this line is the original meander line.

Now, some claim that the lake was really as large as indicated here originally—that is, 40 years ago—while others claim that the lake at that time was no larger than it is now. There is some dispute as to that, but in any event the situation now is the lake has receded to the size as shown upon this plat, partly at least due to the effect of drainage ditches, both public and private, having been constructed there draining the area, which is lower than the land included in the original survey.

Mr. STAFFORD. Are the residents on the land that is sought to be resurveyed mere squatters, or have they any claim to it based upon a patent of adjoining land?

Mr. BURTNESS. The owners of the adjoining land, who would be given the preference right to purchase this land if this bill passes, are homesteaders who made their homestead entry upon the land most of them in the eighties—I think one in 1884, a couple of them in 1886, one in 1883, and I think one under the swamp land act in 1904—and these people who would be given a preference right to purchase have actually since 1899 paid taxes upon this land. This land has been upon the assessment rolls of Polk County, Minn., and these people have paid the taxes assessed. The time they commenced to be taxed was directly following an action in the State courts of Minnesota by the owners of the adjoining land against people who squatted in there with the idea that they might be able to get title.

Mr. STAFFORD. And the State courts have upheld their right to the possession of the land?

Mr. BURTNESS. On the theory they were the riparian owners, owning to the middle of the lake.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the reservation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WALSH). Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to sell for cash at $1.25 per acre any unsurveyed land which may on resurvey be found to exist in sections 21, 28, and 33, in township 149 north, range 40 west, fifth principal meridian, in the State of Minnesota, to those persons who in good faith, by themselves and their predecessors in interest, have heretofore acquired, occupied, and improved such lands under the public land laws in accordance with a Government survey made in 1876; and the Secretary of the Interior may in like manner on principles of equity adjust, settle, and confirm by patent the title to any lands in said area heretofore claimed, occupied, and improved under descriptions which on resurvey are found to be erroneous: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall have the effect of defeating the rights of any other person or persons which may have attached to such lands or any part thereof.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to make any rules and regulations necessary to carry out and effect the purpose of this act, and any person or persons claiming any benefits hereof shall make the required payments and perform such other acts as may be necessary or required within the time fixed in the regulations; otherwise any right or advantage claimed under this act shall be forfeited.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. STEENBERSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

COMPENSATION OF CLERKS AT DISTRICT COURTS.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 8342) to empower the Attorney General of the United States to fix the compensation of clerks of the United States district courts.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Attorney General is hereby authorized and empowered to increase or decrease the salary of any clerk of a United States district court within the limits prescribed by the act approved February 26, 1919, where upon investigation the Attorney General finds that there has been such material increase or decrease in the volume of business transacted in any such district when contrasted with the volume of business upon which the said salaries have been heretofore fixed as to justify such increase or decrease, but in all cases the said increase or decrease shall be based upon the amount of business transacted by the court and the fees and emoluments collected by the clerks and by them paid into the Treasury of the United States during the four years last preceding the time of such increase or decrease of salary to be made by the Attorney General under the power hereby conferred: Provided, That no change in the salary of any clerk having been hereafter fixed under power hereby conferred shall be made until after the lapse of eight years from the date of such change.

The committee amendment was read as follows:

Page 2, line 9, strike out the word "eight" and insert in lieu thereof the word "four."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DOMINICK, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CREDIT FOR MILITARY SERVICE DURING WORLD WAR.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was H. J. Res. 180, extending the provisions of the act of February 25, 1919, allowing credit for military service during the war with Germany in homestead entries, and of public resolution No. 29, approved February 14, 1920, allowing a preferred right of entry for at least 60 days after the date of opening in connection with lands opened or restored to entry, to citizens of the United States who served with the allied armies during the World War.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. FRENCH. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. MANN. Not to-day. I have no objection to its remaining on the calendar.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution hold its place on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Idaho asks unanimous consent that the resolution hold its place on the calendar. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

AMENDING WAR RISK INSURANCE ACT.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 10003) to further amend and modify the war risk insurance act.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have no objection to the passing of the amendment which is incorporated in the bill; but I wish to inquire of the gentleman whether he would have any objection to extending the right of the Government to withhold moneys of soldiers who are inmates of hospitals. It has been called to the attention of the subcommittee preparing the War Department appropriation bill that, so far as the inmates of the National Home hospitals are concerned who are World War veterans, the governors of the homes have no authority to withhold payment of any part of the compensation. In some instances there have been gross abuses by reason of the fact that there is no restraint whatever upon the expenditure of the large amount of compensation that is being paid to the soldiers confined in Government hospitals. In fact, down in Johnson City, Tenn., according to the testimony of a member of the board who was long an honored Member of this House, the conditions are almost a scandal.

There are instances upon instances where the war veterans receive, besides the care and attention the Government gives them, $80 or more, and use it not for their welfare but in ways that tend to their downfall. I have prepared an amendment to meet this condition. I do not wish to jeopardize the passage of the bill, but I can see that there is urgent need for the constituted authorities being vested with authority to hold back this money for the welfare of the soldier, so that when he is discharged it may be turned over to him in a lump, or during the time he is an inmate. If he has a wife or has dependent children, the board of managers or the governor may parcel it out for his dependents' maintenance, rather than allow the soldier to spend it haphazardly, as in many instances, for his own personal destruction.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, there is a great deal of merit in the contention made by the gentleman from Wisconsin, and I think in some cases it would be wise to make some restriction on the expenditure of this money. The trouble, however, in this particular instance, is of such a nature that, of course, everyone who has thought of it will concede that there surely ought to be early legislation of the kind set up in the bill. Under the existing pension laws, as I understand them, inmates of soldiers' homes have, almost wholly, control over the money that is given them as pensions. Am I right about that?

Mr. STAFFORD. No. The governors of the homes have the right to withhold the pension and determine how much should be given for the use of the soldier and how much should be paid for the benefit of his dependent family, and, upon his discharge from the home, turn over the balance owing to him for his own use. But there is no such provision, so far as the World War veterans occupying the Government hospitals are concerned, and in the case of World War veterans the amount of compensation or pension is twofold and in many instances threefold what the old soldiers of the Civil War and the Spanish American War veterans are receiving, and it is an inducement to them to spend it in profligate ways of living. Down at Johnson City, according to the testimony of a former Member of Congress, it has become a scandal.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I have not, and the committee has not, considered the question of including that sort of provision. I will be very frank with the gentleman and say that I do not know how much trouble that would make for this bill. I am very anxious to get this amendment made to the statute the omission of which was evidently an oversight, so that the funds of these men who have been adjudged spendthrifts may be conserved, and I am very fearful an amendment of this kind might meet with some opposition from some quarters that would jeopardize the passage of the bill.

I may say this, however, that if a bill were prepared covering this subject and sent to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, of which I am a member, I will be very glad to suggest the necessity of early hearings upon it and that something be done definitely by that committee to determine that particular matter. But if we put it in here I am afraid it will cause trouble for this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. This bill was reported only recently—February 9. If it had been called to my attention sooner, I would have requested, even with the hearings that I have been attending daily the last six weeks, morning and afternoon, to go before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and suggest the amendment that I have prepared. But I have no desire to jeopardize the passage of this bill. But the amendment I have prepared is in keeping with its general purposes and runs right in with the language of the bill. I think that some legislation should be passed. It is the unanimous opinion of the Board of Managers of the National Soldiers' Homes that similar authority should be extended over the World War veterans who are inmates of the Government hospitals, so as to prevent the extravagant use of the compensation funds, not only for the physical welfare of the World War veterans but for their permanent welfare and give them the accumulated sums to which they are entitled upon their discharge, so that they will have some sufficient competence to go out into the world with.

I withdraw the reservation of objection, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10003) to further amend and modify the war risk insurance act.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 23 of the war risk insurance act, as amended, is hereby further amended so that said section, as amended, shall read as follows:

"Sec. 23. That when, by the terms of this amendatory act, any payment is to be made to a minor, other than a person in the military or naval forces of the United States, or to a person mentally incompetent, or under other legal disability adjudged by a court of competent jurisdiction, such payment shall be made to the person who is constituted guardian, curator, or conservator by the laws of the State or residence of claimant, or is otherwise legally vested with responsibility of care of the claimant or his estate: Provided, That prior to receipt of notice by the United States Veterans' Bureau that any such person is under such other legal disability adjudged by some court of competent jurisdiction, payment may be made to such person direct.

"If any person entitled to receive payments under this act shall be an inmate of any asylum or hospital for the insane maintained by the United States, or by any of the several States or Territories of the United States, or any political subdivision thereof, and no guardian or curator of the property of such person shall have been appointed by competent legal authority, the director, if satisfied after due investigation that any such person is mentally incompetent, may order that all moneys payable to him or her under this act shall be held in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of such person. All funds so held shall be disbursed under the order of the director and subject to his discretion either to the chief executive officer of the asylum or hospital in which such person is an inmate, to be used by such officer for the maintenance and comfort of such inmate, subject to the duty to account to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and to repay any surplus at any time remaining in his hands in accordance with regulations to be prescribed by the director; or to the wife (or dependent husband if the inmate is a woman), minor children, and dependent parents of such inmate, in such amounts as the director shall find necessary for their support and maintenance in the order named; or, if at any time such inmate shall be found to be mentally competent, or shall die, or a guardian or curator of his or her estate be appointed, any balance remaining to the credit of such inmate shall be paid to such inmate, if mentally competent, and otherwise to his or her guardian, curator, or personal representatives."

The following committee amendment was read:

Page 2, line 2, strike out the word "of" and insert in lieu thereof the word "or."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. May I have the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM], who introduced the bill? I suppose that possibly the word "guardian" or "curator" of an insane person might be sufficient to cover the term "conservator." If I remember, in Illinois we do not have a guardian or curator, but a conservator.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Conservator.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I notice the gentleman inserted the word "conservator" here in one place and left it out in three places. Would it not be just as well to insert it in the other places? When we insert it once we assume the words "guardian" and "curator" are not sufficient, and if they are not sufficient we ought to put in "conservator."

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Is that in the second paragraph?

Mr. MANN. It is in the second paragraph. We have a conservator of a person and a conservator of an estate in Illinois.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes, sir. I think that would be advisable.

Mr. MANN. Then, Mr. Speaker, I move to amend page 2, line 11, by striking out the word "or," between the words "guardian" and "curator," and insert after the word "curator" the words "or conservator."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MANN: Page 2, line 11, after the word "guardian," strike out the word "or," and after the word "curator" insert the words "or conservator."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Now, I offer the same amendment in line 6, page 3.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MANN: Page 3, line 6, after the word "guardian," strike out the word "or," and after the word "curator" insert the words "or conservator."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Then, in line 9, after the word "curator," insert the word "conservator."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MANN: Page 3, line 9, after the word "curator" insert the word "conservator."

The question was taken and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, it occurs to me that on page 3 there ought to be a comma after the word "guardian."

Mr. MANN. It is not necessary for us to do that. That is part of the duty of the engrossing clerk. If the engrossing clerk did not know enough to insert a comma in such places we would not have proper punctuation anywhere.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Illinois a question?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Certain terms have been inserted here in order to meet the provisions of State statutes. Have we used the word "committee" at any point? Some of the States call the person appointed "a committee."

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, let me say on that proposition that I submitted this bill to the Veterans' Bureau in the first place. When I drafted the bill originally I did not have this second paragraph in it. I simply had the first paragraph, and I had it just as the statute originally was, and added the word "conservator," thinking through an excess of caution that the word "conservator" should go in. The bureau then reported to me that their law officer had held—and I suspect properly—that the words already in the act included a conservator.

Mr. MANN. I would not have suggested that the word "conservator" be included if it were not already in the bill. I suppose it is covered by existing law. They apply it in any case.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I suppose they are right about it. But through excess of caution I inserted it. They have also held that the words "or his estate," in line 2, page 2, were included in the meaning of the existing law, but thought it would do no harm to state it plainly in this amendment. I am sure the general designation of "committee" as applied to a person under disability would be included in the meaning of the words already in the statute.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

STATUE OF GEN. E. KIRBY SMITH.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the resolution (H. Con. Res. 42) thanking the State of Florida for the statue of Gen. E. Kirby Smith.

The title of the resolution was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 42).

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the thanks of Congress be given to the people of Florida for the statue of Gen. E. Kirby Smith.

Resolved, That the statue be accepted, to remain in the National Statuary Hall in the Capitol of the Nation, and that a copy of these resolutions, signed by the presiding officers of the House of Representatives and Senate, be forwarded to his excellency the governor of the State of Florida.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MANN: Amend, line 3, by striking out the word "people" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "State."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a further amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois offers a further amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MANN: Amend line 4 by inserting, after the word "accepted," the words "in the name of the United States."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a further amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MANN: Amend lines 6 and 7 by striking out the words "signed by the presiding officers of the House of Representatives and Senate" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "suitably engrossed and duly authenticated."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the word "National" in line 5.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MANN moves to amend line 5 by striking out the word "National."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion. The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

EXCHANGE OF LANDS FOR PUBLIC-SCHOOL PURPOSES IN IDAHO.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 9499) to authorize the State of Idaho to exchange certain lands heretofore granted for public-school purposes for other Government lands.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, what is the necessity for this measure?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The State owns a great many of these sections of land with the national forests, from which it is not getting any revenue, and the State can not dispose of them. We want to exchange these lands for land of equal value, as described in the bill. The land the State desires is timbered in character and has been withdrawn from settlement for over five years. If it were open to entry under the timber and stone act, it would probably be taken up by the timber companies, and we want the State to get the benefit of these lands and the income they will bring, instead of letting them go into the hands of the large timber companies.

Mr. WALSH. I understand that these sections 16 and 36 are set aside for school purposes?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Yes. When the State of Idaho was admitted, sections 16 and 36 were granted by the Federal Government to the State for the benefit of public schools in the State, and a large quantity of these school lands have been disposed of and the proceeds used as provided by law. A great many of these school sections, however, are located in forest reserves and are so inaccessible as to make it impossible to dispose of them at a reasonable price. It is the desire of the State to exchange these school sections in forest reserves for land described in the bill, on the public domain, which are more accessible and from which the State may derive a revenue for the benefit of public schools.

This legislation will be in the interest of the Government by enabling the Forest Service to exclude from the forest lands in State ownership and will also be beneficial to the State, as the lands to be selected can be utilized for the benefit of the school fund.

The enactment of the legislation is recommended by the Acting Secretary of Agriculture and by the Acting Secretary of the Interior in the following letters addressed to the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands of the House of Representatives.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the reservation.

Mr. MCARTHUR. Is it not true also that the forest reserves will be blocked out and squared out?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Yes; it will enable the Forest Service to do better administrative work.

Mr. MCARTHUR. The Forest Service will operate the total area instead of only part of it?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. They will if we quit passing these acts permitting exchanges.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. These exchanges are considered beneficial not only to the Government but to the State. Where the State lands are in these inaccessible and remote sections of the national forests the State can not get any benefit from them.

Mr. WALSH. I withdraw the reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, upon the recommendation of the Secretary of Agriculture, to accept title from the State of Idaho to certain sections 16 and 36 within the boundaries of national forests of Idaho which were granted for public-school purposes and in exchange therefor to issue patents for equal values of any or all of the following-described lands found and determined to be nonmineral in character:

In township 39 north, range 3 east: Section 10, the southeast quarter; section 14, the north half of the north half and the northwest quarter of the southwest quarter; section 15, the southeast quarter of the northeast quarter and the north half of the southeast quarter; section 23, the southeast quarter and the south half of the northeast quarter and the south half of the southwest quarter; section 24, lot 1, the northwest quarter of the northeast quarter, the north half of the northwest quarter; lot 3, the northwest quarter of the southeast quarter and the north half of the southwest quarter; section 25, lot 1, the west half of the northeast quarter and the southeast quarter of the northeast quarter; section 26, the north half of the north half.

In township 40 north, range 3 east: Section 25, the southwest quarter of the southwest quarter; section 26, the southeast quarter of the southeast quarter; section 35, the north half of the northeast quarter.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 6, after the word "certain" strike out the word "lands" and insert the words "sections 16 and 36."

Page 1, line 9, after the word "for" strike out the word "approximately."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. SMITH of Idaho, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

MALHEUR NATIONAL FOREST, OREGON.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 10185) authorizing the exchange of lands within or contiguous to the Malheur National Forest, in the State of Oregon, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized in his discretion to accept, on behalf of the United States, title to any lands in private ownership within or contiguous to the exterior boundaries of the Malheur National Forest which, in the opinion of the Secretary of Agriculture, are chiefly valuable for national forest purposes, and, in exchange therefor, may issue patent for an equal value of national forest land in the State of Oregon; or the Secretary of Agriculture may permit the grantor to cut and remove an equal value of timber from any national forest in the State of Oregon, the values in each instance to be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture and be acceptable to the owners as fair compensation. Timber given in such exchanges shall be cut and removed under the direction and supervision and in accordance with the requirements of the Secretary of Agriculture. Lands conveyed to the United States under this act shall, upon acceptance of title, become parts of the Malheur National Forest.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 5, after the word "within" strike out the words "or contiguous to."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, we have had a good many measures of late authorizing the exchange of lands within the exterior boundaries of national forests for other public lands in the State. Have we had reported many bills of similar import to this, authorizing the exchange of forest lands within a national forest for similar forest lands in other forest reserves?

Mr. SINNOTT. The usual bill is like this. The bill of which the gentleman has spoken is the exception to the usual bill. This is in the ordinary form.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am referring to the policy of the committee as to authorizing exchanges of land for other land in forest reserves. How many of the bills that we have recently passed have authorized the exchange of lands within a forest reserve for public lands outside a forest reserve?

Mr. SINNOTT. We have had very few of those bills; not over two or three.

Mr. MANN. The lands are usually in the forest.

Mr. SINNOTT. This is the usual form.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

The SPEAKER. There is a proposed committee amendment to the title of the bill.

Mr. SINNOTT. I desire to offer an additional amendment to the title—to insert after the word "the," in the second line of the title, before the word "Malheur," the words "exterior boundaries of the."

The amendment to the title was agreed to.

The title of the bill was amended to read:

Authorizing the exchange of lands within the exterior boundaries of the Malheur National Forest, in the State of Oregon, and for other purposes.

On motion of Mr. SINNOTT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

LAND FOR PUBLIC PARK IN THE STATE OF WASHINGTON.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 9235) providing for a grant of land to the State of Washington for public park purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to have some little explanation of this measure.

Mr. HADLEY. Mr. Speaker, there are several military reservations located near one another in the vicinity of a pass in the State of Washington on Puget Sound, known as Deception Pass, which are the subject of this bill. They are not in use by the Government, and so far as I know never have been, and I have known them for some thirty-odd years. There are no improvements, no fortifications, no garrisons, no armament on them. They have never been used at all for military purposes. They are valuable for use for public-park purposes. They afford a very exceptional view of islands, lakes, mountains, and sea of the most attractive and impressive nature. The people have resorted to these reservations for years. The timber on them is liable to destruction by fire, and vandalism may occur from time to time. They ought to be supervised. We have in the State of Washington a committee on public parks, created by statute, which has jurisdiction of the parks of the State, and they are promoting the reservation of parks and the beautification of these areas in various parts of the State for the benefit of the public. The War Department has recommended the use of this land for park purposes; that is to say, they have no objection to this legislation. The State park committee has made application for it. The lands are of no consequential value for any other purpose, and we want to reserve them from speculation in case they should be taken up by private parties for future purposes. We want to devote them to public-park purposes. There is a condition of reversion in the bill, so that the Government can reenter at any time without notice, in case the lands should not be used for the purpose specified, take possession, and occupy them for military, naval, or lighthouse purposes without any compensation to the State for such use and occupation. This is a grant to the State, a conveyance on its face different from the one mentioned a few minutes ago in the case of another bill, but with a reversionary provision.

Mr. WALSH. It is the intention that this shall be converted to public uses?

Mr. HADLEY. Certainly; it is so provided, and it reverts to the Government on the nonuse of it.

Mr. WALSH. And there are no public improvements upon it?

Mr. HADLEY. None.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HADLEY. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. The land is so described in the bill that the passage of the law will pass the title without any other conveyance?

Mr. HADLEY. The effect of the language is that the title and fee of certain lands described are hereby granted to the State of Washington.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. The reason that I asked the gentleman the question was in reference to action that we had upon another bill. The difference between this bill and the other bill is that you have the land so described that the title will vest automatically on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. HADLEY. Yes; in my reference to another bill I had in mind the remarks made by the gentleman from Virginia some time ago on that bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the title and fee to all of the land comprising the military reservation situated on Fidalgo Island, in Skagit County, State of Washington, in township 34 north, range 1 east of the Willamette meridian, north of the entrance to Deception Pass, including the two islands in the pass, containing about 550 acres, and to the land comprising the military reservation situated on the northern end of Whidby Island, in Island County, State of Washington, in township 34 north, range 1 east of the Willamette meridian, south of the entrance to Deception Pass, containing about 630 acres, be, and the same are hereby, granted, subject to the conditions and reversion herein-after provided for, to the State of Washington for public park purposes, subject, however, to the right of the United States to at any and all times and in any manner assume control of, hold, use, and occupy without license, consent, or leave from said State any or all of said lands for any and all military, naval, or lighthouse purposes, free from any conveyances, charges, encumbrances, or liens made, created, permitted, or sanctioned thereon by said State: Provided, That the United States shall not be or become liable for any damages or compensation whatever to the said State of Washington for any future use by the Government of any or all of the above-described land for any of the above-mentioned purposes: Provided further, That if said lands shall not be used for the purposes herein above mentioned the same or such parts thereof not so used shall revert to the United States.

With the following committee amendment:

After the word "acres," in line 13, page 1, of the bill, insert the following: "and to the land comprising the military reservation situated on Whidby Island (north point of) in township 34 north, ranges 1 and 2 east of the Willamette meridian, containing about 606 acres, and to the land comprising the military reservation situated east of Deception Pass in said township 34 north, range 2 east of the Willamette meridian, consisting of Hope Island and Skagit Island, containing about 200 acres."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HADLEY, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MAKING FURTHER PROVISION FOR THE NATIONAL DEFENSE.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 2774) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes,' approved June 3, 1916, and to establish military justice," approved June 4, 1920.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, as I understand the purpose of the bill, it is to authorize the War Department to make available certain national appropriations for the maintenance of the National Guard, so as to include motor-drawn and air-service equipment.

Mr. CRAGO. That is correct. It is already appropriated, but it did not include the proper language, so that it could not be used. It is only in relation to service and material already issued that the National Guard officials are very anxious to have this change made. I will say further that there is a typographical error which exists in the bill. Where it says June 4, 1921, it should be 1920.

Mr. STAFFORD. While I see the urgent need of having authorization, so far as motor-drawn vehicles are concerned, and also, perhaps, some authority to permit of the expenditure on aircraft equipment now with the National Guard, I wish to say that I am not in sympathy at all with the present policy of the Government in trying to organize the National Guard with every character of equipment and training the members in the varying arms of the service so that they are a counterpart of the Regular Army. In this particular I wish to say that the Secretary of War in a hearing this morning before the Committee on Appropriations said that he was not in sympathy with the policy of trying to nationalize the National Guard in having it equipped in every particular like the Regular Army. We have an appropriation pending, requested by the Militia Bureau, of more than $80,000,000 for the maintenance of the National Guard next year, without considering the expense of the Regular Army officers. Much of the expense is due to these side activities, which, in my opinion, are merely frills and fads. So far as the air service in the Regular Army is concerned, it is necessary to have some activity to develop that line, but to have the National Guard trained in this line during their two weeks of service is carrying preparedness to an extreme. As far as the motor equipment is concerned, it is necessary to have sample tractors and certain motor vehicles. But as far as the air service is concerned it is extravagance running wild. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 90 of the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes,' approved June 3, 1916, and to establish military justice," approved June 4, 1921, be amended so as to read as follows:

"Sec. 90. That funds allotted by the Secretary of War for the support of the National Guard shall be available for the purchase and issue of forage, bedding, shoeing, and veterinary service, and supplies for the Government animals issued to any organization, and for the compensation of competent help for the care of material, animals, and equipment issued mounted and other organizations, including motor-drawn and air service, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe: Provided, That the men to be compensated, not to exceed five for each organization, shall be duly enlisted therein and shall be detailed by the organization commander, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe, and shall be paid by the United States disbursing officer in each State, Territory, and the District of Columbia."

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend, in line 7, page 1, by striking out "1921" and inserting "1920."

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CRAGO moves to amend, on page 1, line 7 by striking out "1921" and inserting "1920."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend, line 2, page 2, by striking out the word "service" and inserting the word "services."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

AMENDING THE NATIONAL DEFENSE ACT.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 2307) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for making further and more effectual provisions for the national defense, and for other purposes,' approved June 3, 1916, and to establish military justice," approved June 4, 1920.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is rather an important measure to take up for consideration under unanimous consent. The bill is 12 pages long and amends several sections of the national defense act. I do not think we ought to consider it to-day.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold that for a moment?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. CRAGO. I want to say that I am somewhat in accord with the gentleman's views regarding the matter of putting a bill of that size and character on the Unanimous Consent Calendar. I questioned the advisability of it myself, but the circumstances are these: The National Guard Association of the United States has agreed on these amendments. The War Department is in sympathy with the move to make these amendments, and the Militia Bureau is insisting upon it. The National Guard Association of the United States meets in New Orleans, I believe, some time next week. They are anxious to have this legislation cleaned up before they have that meeting, because it embodies the work of their legislative committee. That was the reason for putting these two bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar. I do not believe there is a thing in the bill which would not meet with the approval of the House, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. WALSH. Are there any controversial matters here?

Mr. CRAGO. Absolutely none. They have been agreed on by all of these different organizations.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman make a brief statement about the purpose of the bill?

Mr. CRAGO. I can do that, but it will take some little time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, with all deference to the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, I think this bill is too important to be considered under unanimous consent. The matter has been called to my attention by the adjutant general of my State, and some of these suggested amendments, I think, are rather too drastic.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman permit the gentleman from Pennsylvania to make a brief statement of the purpose of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Certainly.

Mr. CRAGO. The changes are set forth very clearly in the report of the committee. They are embraced in the letter to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, which is a study by the War Department, from the office of the Chief of Staff. I have been personally familiar with the position which the Chief of the Militia Bureau holds regarding these changes. They have been well presented to the Military Committee and hearings have been had and those hearings are printed. At the hearings we had before us the Chief of the Militia Bureau, some of the other officers of the War Department, and the officers representing the legislative committee of the National Guard Association of the United States.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. In view of the pending reduction in the appropriation for the Army, does the gentleman think that any of these changes might well await action upon the reduction in those appropriations?

Mr. CRAGO. The changes have nothing to do with the reductions in the Army. They do not embrace the expenditure of money.

Mr. WALSH. They all apply to the National Guard operations?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, permit me to suggest that while the bill is rather long, it is a reenactment amending various provisions of the National Guard act, and the changes are not very many and are easily understood if anyone will compare the bill with existing law, which I did. Of course, I have not much knowledge of military law, but the changes that are proposed, while important to the National Guard in some respects, are not numerous at all.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the reservation of objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I renew it.

Mr. CRAGO. I would like very much if we could consider the bill to-day. I was asked to make a brief statement.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course, I shall reserve my objection to allow the gentleman to make a statement.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does the gentleman intend to object finally?

Mr. STAFFORD. I do.

Mr. CRAGO. If the gentleman intends to object, I see no use in taking up the time of the House.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be passed over without prejudice, to remain at the foot of the calendar.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CHEYENNE RIVER AND STANDING ROCK INDIAN RESERVATIONS, NORTH AND SOUTH DAKOTA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 9710) authorizing extension of time for the payment of purchase money due under certain homestead entries and town-lot purchases within the former Cheyenne River and Standing Rock Indian Reservations, North Dakota and South Dakota.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk reported the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any homestead entryman or purchaser of Government town lots within the former Cheyenne River and Standing Rock Indian Reservations in North Dakota and South Dakota who is unable to make payment of purchase money due under his entry or contract of purchase as required by existing law or regulations, on application duly verified showing that he is unable to make payment as required, shall be granted an extension to the 1923 anniversary of the date of his entry or contract of purchase upon payment of interest in advance at the rate of 5 per cent per annum on the amounts due from the maturity thereof to the said anniversary; and if at the expiration of the extended period the entryman or purchaser of town lots is still unable to make the payment he may, upon the same terms and conditions, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, be granted such further extensions of time as the facts warrant.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 4, strike out the words "town lots" and insert in lieu thereof the word "lands."

Page 2, line 9, after the word "time" insert the words "not exceeding a period of three years."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, on page 2, in line 5, the word "anniversary" will be correctly spelled.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read:

"A bill authorizing extensions of time for the payment of purchase money due under certain homestead entries and Government-land purchases within the former Cheyenne River and Standing Rock Indian Reservations, North Dakota and South Dakota."

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

APPLYING PENSION LAWS TO CERTAIN PERSONS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 10196) to provide for the applicability of the pension laws to certain classes of persons in the military and naval services not entitled to the benefits of article 3 of the war risk insurance act, as amended.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I inquire of some member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce whether this merely grants the right to members of the Army and the Navy who enlisted subsequent to a certain date to be entitled to the benefits of the pension laws of the United States?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. That is all.

Mr. STAFFORD. It does not apply to compensation in any way.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. No; it just gives them their pensionable status.

Mr. RAYBURN. The only purpose is to make applicable to men coming into the Army the law that was in operation before the war risk insurance act was passed.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 312 of the war risk insurance act, as amended by section 17 of the act of June 25, 1918 (40 Stat., 613), shall not be construed as making the pension laws inapplicable to persons admitted into the military or naval service after six months from the passage of the act of August 9, 1921, establishing the Veterans' Bureau and adding section 315 to the war risk insurance act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to speak for two minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I would like to ask on what subject?

Mr. SEARS. The concurrent resolution just passed, the Gen. Kirby Smith resolution.

Mr. WALSH. I shall object if the gentleman only asks for two minutes, but if he asks for five I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, I deserve no credit for offering this resolution, but simply followed the custom that has been followed for many years. At the time I introduced this resolution I little knew how many relatives this distinguished gentleman had, the late Gen. E. Kirby Smith. Since introducing it I find that one of the leading doctors of Jacksonville, Fla., is a son of this general, and he also has a daughter who lives in Chicago, in the district of my distinguished colleague, whom I admire, Mr. MANN. I want to thank my colleagues even at this late day on behalf of my State and the relatives of Gen. E. Kirby Smith for accepting this statue, and I certainly appreciate the courtesy which has been extended to me. [Applause.]

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to the following:

Mr. FULMER, for one week.

Mr. CLARK of Florida, for two days, on account of illness.

ORDER OF BUSINESS FOR TO-MORROW.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn, and pending that, I think we have all been informed by the little circular from the floor leader of the House what will be up to-morrow.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the gentleman will yield, I note that one of the matters scheduled for to-morrow on the bulletin is what I assume to be an omnibus legislative Indian bill. I was just wondering how this was going to come up. There is no rule for it.

Mr. MANN. I think it was the intention of the gentleman from Wyoming to ask unanimous consent—I have not the number of the bill—that the bill may be in order and be taken up after consideration of the housing bill to-morrow, the number of which I also do not have.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does the gentleman from Illinois understand it is a unanimous report from the committee?

Mr. MANN. I so understand it; yes. I have that impression, but not the information. There is no minority report.

Mr. GARNER. Do I understand the gentleman is asking unanimous consent that it may be in order to take it up to-morrow or that it will continue to be the business in order?

Mr. MANN. I ask that it be in order to take it up to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the bill referred to be in order to be taken up to-morrow. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 5859. An act for the relief of Ellen M. Willey, widow of Owen S. Willey;

H. R. 77. An act for the consolidation of forest lands within the Clearwater, St. Joe, and Selway National Forests;

H. R. 10009. An act to authorize the State of Alabama, through its highway department, to construct and maintain a bridge across the Tombigbee River at or near Moscow Landing, in the State of Alabama;

H. R. 8818. An act granting the consent of Congress to the city of Pittsburgh, a municipal corporation of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Monongahela River at or near its junction with the Allegheny River in the city of Pittsburgh, in the county of Allegheny, in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania; and

H. R. 9386. An act to grant the consent of Congress to the Whiteville Lumber Co. to construct a bridge across the Waccamaw River at or near Pireway Ferry, County of Columbus, N. C.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 52. An act for the relief of the Stevens Institute of Technology, of Hoboken, N. J.;

S. 29. An act authorizing the Secretary of War to grant to Lloyd E. Gandy, of Spokane, Wash., his heirs and assigns, the right to overflow certain lands on the Fort George Wright Military Reservation, at Spokane, Wash., on such terms and conditions with respect to improvements to be made on the present target range as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, or in lieu of such improvements to be made on the present target range, the Secretary of War may accept a conveyance to the United States of such other lands to be designated by the Secretary of War as may be deemed suitable for a target range in exchange for such overflow lands; that to facilitate the acquisition of the necessary additional lands the Secretary of War is authorized to condemn land necessary and suitable for target-range purposes, such condemnation to be at the expense of said Lloyd E. Gandy, grantee, his heirs and assigns;

S. 561. An act to grant citizens of Washington and Kane Counties, Utah, the right to cut timber in the State of Arizona for agricultural, mining, and other domestic purposes;

S. 901. An act for the payment of certain money to Albert H. Reynolds; and

S. 1247. An act for the relief of Frank Carpenter.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. ROSSDALE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on House joint resolution 257.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 16 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, February 21, 1922, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

545. A communication from the President of the United States, transmitting an estimate of appropriation in the sum of $151,620.39 required for contingent expenses of the House of Representatives for the fiscal year 1922 (H. Doc. No. 189); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

546. A communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation for the Department of Commerce for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, in the sum of $17,900 (H. Doc. No. 190); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

547. A letter from the governor of the Federal Reserve Board, transmitting the Eighth Annual Report of the Federal Reserve Board, covering operations for the year 1921; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

548. A communication from the President of the United States, transmitting an estimate of appropriation submitted by the Architect of the Capitol in the sum of $49,000 required for the maintenance of the House Office Building for the fiscal year 1922 (H. Doc. No. 191); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. MOORES of Indiana: Committee on Foreign Affairs. H. J. Res. 272. A joint resolution transferring to the custody of the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution certain relics now in the possession of the Department of State; without amendment (Rept. No. 712). Referred to the House Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. KAHN: A bill (H. R. 10516) to authorize the collection in monthly installments of indebtedness due the United States by general prisoners restored to duty, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. LAZARO: A bill (H. R. 10517) confirming and validating the title of certain purchasers from the State of Louisiana of certain lands formerly included in the Fort Sabine Military Reservation, in Cameron Parish, La., now abandoned; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. J. M. NELSON: A bill (H. R. 10518) to amend section 1 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved July 27, 1916, and section 1 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the control of the floods of the Mississippi River and of the Sacramento River, Calif., and for other purposes," approved March 1, 1917; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. BEGG: A bill (H. R. 10519) to provide for the further investigation of the proposed waterway projects to connect the Ohio River with Lake Erie; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Washington: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 273) to amend an act entitled "An act to limit the immigration of aliens into the United States," approved May 19, 1921; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. TOWNER: Concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 47) to authorize the printing of the report of the special mission on investigation to the Philippine Islands as a public document; to the Committee on Printing.

By Mr. UNDERHILL: Resolution (H. Res. 289) authorizing and directing an investigation into the operations of the George Washington Memorial Association, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Rules.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ATKESON: A bill (H. R. 10520) granting a pension to Eunice Shalley; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Riley, controller of California, protesting against increase in Federal inheritance tax rates; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

4195. By Mr. ROSSDALE: Resolution adopted by Frank J. Finan and others, to give favorable consideration to House bill 9691, a bill to permit the manufacture and sale of light wines and beer; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 21, 1922.

(Legislative day of Monday, February 20, 1922.)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed Senate bills of the following titles, each with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

S. 621. An act to amend subdivision (c) of section 206 of the transportation act, 1920; and

S. 2774. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes,' approved June 3, 1916, and to establish military justice," approved June 4, 1920.

The message also announced that the House had passed Senate bills of the following titles, each with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

S. 2072. An act to authorize the Secretary of War to make and receive conveyances effecting an exchange of title to the railroad rights of way at Camp Henry Knox, Ky., and for other purposes; and

S. 2810. An act to amend and reenact section 113 of chapter 5 of the Judicial Code of the United States, as amended and reenacted by an act approved the 22d day of August, 1914.

The message further announced that the House had passed without amendment the bill (S. 2138) providing that the Government property known as the St. Francis Barracks, at St. Augustine, Fla., be donated to the State of Florida for military purposes.

AMENDMENT OF TRANSPORTATION ACT OF 1920.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the action of the House on Senate bill 621.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 621) to amend subdivision (c) of section 206 of the transportation act, 1920, which were to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That subdivision (a) of section 206 of the transportation act, 1920, be, and the same hereby is, amended by striking out the period at the end thereof, substituting a semicolon, and adding the following: "except that actions to enforce awards made by the commission under the provisions of subdivision (c) against the agent so designated by the President may be brought within one year after the date of the commission's award."

SEC. 2. That subdivision (c) of said section 206 be, and the same hereby is, amended to read as follows:

"(c) Complaints praying for reparation on account of damage claimed to have been caused by reason of the collection or enforcement of or through the President during the period of Federal control of rates, fares, charges, classifications, regulations, or practices (including those applicable to interstate, foreign, or intrastate traffic) which were unjust, unreasonable, unjustly discriminatory, or unduly or unreasonably prejudicial, or otherwise in violation of the interstate commerce act, may be filed with the commission within one year, or, if so claimed in respect of overcharges above the legal tariff charge, within two years and six months, after the termination of Federal control, against the agent designated by the President, under subdivision (a), naming in the petition the railroad or system of transportation against which such complaint would have been brought if such railroad or system had not been under Federal control at the time the matter complained of took place. The commission is hereby given jurisdiction to hear and decide such complaints in the manner provided in the interstate commerce act, and all notices and orders in such proceedings shall be served upon the agent designated by the President under subdivision (a)."

And to amend the title so as to read: "An act to amend subdivisions (a) and (c) of section 206 of the transportation act, 1920."

Mr. CUMMINS. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendments.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I would like to have a little explanation from the Senator as to the House substitute and the effect of it.

Mr. CUMMINS. The transportation act provides in section 206 that suits against the Director General of Railroads upon any account growing out of Federal control shall be brought within two years. That is paragraph (a) of section 206. Paragraph (c) of the same section provides that claims for reparation for the refund of overcharges and the like must be filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission; that the commission must pass upon the validity of the claims for overcharges; and that suits for overcharges must be brought within a year after having been so filed.

It turns out that the commission has not been able to dispose of the claims as rapidly as it was anticipated they might be disposed of and a great many of them are pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission undecided. The statute of limitations is about to run against all these claims.

The bill passed by the Senate provided for an extension of time for filing the claims with the commission. The amendment made by the House is that, in addition to the extension of time for filing the claims with the commission, the time for bringing suit against the director general shall be extended for one year, or shall continue for one year after the commission decides as to the validity of the claims. As the Senator understands, the law now provides that no suit can be brought until after the commission passes upon the claim. The House amendment also extends for six months the time for filing claims with the commission. It is simply to protect those who have just and valid claims against the Government for overcharges.

Mr. KING. I have no objection to the House amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendments of the House.

The amendments were concurred in.

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENSE ACT.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the amendments of the House to Senate bill 2774.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2774) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes,' approved June 3, 1916, and to establish military justice," approved June 4, 1920, which were, on page 1, line 7, to strike out "1921" and insert "1920," and on page 1, line 12, strike out "service" and insert "services."

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the two amendments to the bill adopted by the other House are merely in the nature of the correction of typographical errors. They change not in the slightest degree the intent or meaning of the bill, and I move that the Senate concur in the House amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF THE JUDICIAL CODE.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 2810) to amend and reenact section 113 of chapter 5 of the Judicial Code of the United States, as amended and reenacted by an act approved the 22d day of August, 1914, which was, on page 2, line 22, to strike out "first" and to insert "third."

Mr. LODGE. On behalf of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

CALL OF THE ROLL.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Gerry	McNary	Spencer
Borah	Glass	Moses	Stanfield
Brandagee	Gooding	Myers	Stanley
Bursum	Harrell	Nelson	Sterling
Calder	Harris	New	Swanson
Cameron	Harrison	Newberry	Trammell
Capper	Heflin	Norris	Underwood
Caraway	Johnson	Overman	Wadsworth
Colt	Jones, N. Mex.	Pepper	Walsh, Mass.
Culberson	Jones, Wash.	Phipps	Walsh, Mont.
Cummins	Kellogg	Poinexter	Warren
Dial	Kendrick	Pomerene	Watson, Ga.
Edge	King	Ransdell	Williams
Ernst	Ladd	Sheppard	Willis
Fernald	Lodge	Shortridge
Fletcher	McKellar	Simmons
France	McKinley	Smith

Mr. JONES of Washington. I was requested to announce that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE] and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] are absent on account of illness.

I was also requested to announce that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOR], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] are detained at a hearing before the Committee on Finance.

Mr. NORRIS. I was requested to announce the absence of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] on account of a death in his family.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHELDS] is absent on account of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

THE SOLDIERS' BONUS AND ALLIED INDEBTEDNESS.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that to-morrow, at the close of the morning business, if it meets the convenience of the Senate, I shall address the Senate rather briefly upon the subject of the problem of the soldiers' bonus, the debts owing us by allied nations which prevent the restoration of Europe and cause demoralization here, and the solution.

In connection with my remarks I shall have some maps to show, which are the result of a very great amount of research and which I believe will prove to be interesting.

In addition to that I have a very interesting set of films bearing upon this subject which I shall be glad to show. I do not know whether or not it will be possible to show these films in the Senate Chamber in connection with my remarks. I wish that we might have the facilities here in connection with the Senate for showing films which might illustrate the subject matter of a Senator's remarks. Probably at some time in the future we shall have such facilities; but if it is not feasible to show these films in the Senate Chamber, I shall be very glad to show them after the adjournment of the Senate, and I shall be very glad to have Senators and Members of the House of Representatives who care to do so view these films, which I think will, in a very illuminating and interesting manner, open up the subject which I am seeking to discuss. I think the Members of the Senate will at least find the subject which I intend to present an interesting one, even though they may not agree with me in my conclusions.

RETIREMENT OF DISABLED ARMY OFFICERS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1565) making eligible for retirement under the same conditions as now provided for officers of the Regular Army all officers of the United States Army during the World War who have incurred physical disability in line of duty.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee, as amended.

Mr. KING. Does the amendment, as amended, comprise the entire substitute for the bill, may I inquire of the Chair?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It does.

Mr. KING. Very well; then I shall not ask that it be read.

Mr. President, I regret the absence of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], whose illness compels him to remain at home. I am advised that he intended moving to recommit the pending bill. If some other Senator, in his absence, fails to do so, I shall submit such a motion at the conclusion of the few observations which I shall submit. I have been detained from the Senate most of the time during the discussions upon this bill because of service upon committees which are even now in session. I came into the Chamber a moment ago expecting that the bill would be voted upon after very brief discussion. I am advised that no one desires to speak, and I shall therefore occupy a few minutes presenting my views upon this bill.

There is no Senator opposed to the most generous appropriations for those who have suffered injuries or incurred disabilities in the great World War. We have appropriated hundreds of millions of dollars by way of compensation to those who have been injured and in behalf of the families and dependents of those who have received disabilities or those who gave their lives upon the battle fields. History does not furnish a parallel of such generous treatment accorded the sick and wounded and disabled as presented by this Nation in its treatment of those who served in the Army and the Navy in the war against the central empires, and this generous treatment meets with universal approval, and the burdens of taxes thus imposed are willingly and cheerfully borne by the people of our country.

If there are those who served as officers in the World War—not of the Regular Army—who are now receiving inadequate compensation for disabilities or injuries, then a proper measure should be enacted that will do justice to them. The officers referred to, whether colonels, majors, captains, or lieutenants, are receiving the same compensation for injuries sustained as are being received by the thousands and tens of thousands of American boys who served and suffered as they did. In other words, under existing law those who served as emergency officers receive compensation and are treated as generously as are the private soldiers who served upon bloody battle fields and who exposed their lives to shot and shell. So far as I am advised, there has been no suggestion by the ex-officers, who are to be beneficiaries under this bill, that they receive additional compensation because of the inadequacy of that now paid; but the demand is that they shall receive "retirement" benefits and privileges the same as officers of the Regular Army.

The Reserve officers claim privileges and advantages denied to their brothers and relatives and companions and friends who served as privates with equal valor and bravery and distinction in the World War. I repeat, there has been no complaint, so far as I am advised, that the liberal appropriations for the wounded and the disabled have not been and are not adequate. If such complaints are made and are just, Congress will immediately grant full relief. It is recognized that the compensation allowed for injuries exceeds that heretofore granted by any nation on earth. It is not contended by the proponents of this bill that those who are suffering from disabilities incurred as a result of their services in the war are not generously compensated, but they argue that, notwithstanding the generous treatment, those who were fortunate enough to obtain commissions of a temporary character are to be lifted out of the category now obtaining and placed in a special class and granted privileges denied to the four millions who constituted the privates in our mighty Army.

Mr. President, I am unable to comprehend the line of reasoning which justifies this legislation. I am unable to understand how Senators who, from appearances, are in a spasm of solicitude for the ex-service men, can bring themselves to support a bill which discriminates against the soldier and in favor of the officer. I can not comprehend how Senators can support a bill that says to the brave boys who fought in the trenches and offered their bodies as a wall against the advancing tide of the enemy, "You are unworthy to have the same benefits and advantages and privileges that are to be bestowed upon those holding commissions in the Army," though thousands of them never went overseas and though their services involved no danger or exposure to danger whatever.

It is difficult for me to perceive any substantial reasons for differentiating between two brothers, both of whom volunteered or entered the Army through the door of the draft, one being fortunate enough to obtain a commission and the other serving and fighting as a private. And yet this bill permits one brother, who incurred 30 per cent disabilities—disabilities perhaps resulting from sickness while he was serving as an officer in the Quartermaster Corps or as an inspector of lumber or timbers or ordnance in the United States—to be retired upon three-fourths pay for life. The other brother, who went overseas and carried a gun upon his shoulder and faced the enemy in bloody battle and incurred 50 per cent or 75 per cent disability, perhaps lost an arm or leg or an eye, or both eyes for that matter, receives only limited compensation—less than that which his brother would receive. I was told of a young man who was an inspector in some of the Government plants, obtained a commission as colonel, and now claims disabilities of 30 per cent. Under this bill he would be granted retirement privileges and be paid three-fourths of the compensation allowed a colonel, the payment to extend during his entire life. He thus would obtain several thousand dollars each year, though the disability is not so great as to prohibit him from engaging in his former occupation.

The disability constitutes but slight impediment to his engaging in the same class of work as that which he performed before. How can we justify a policy that pays this man thousands of dollars annually and allows to the privates, who went overseas and encountered danger and received wounds and are so incapacitated that they are unable to work or to obtain a livelihood, but a few hundred dollars per annum? Was it thought, when we entered the war and the American boys were volunteering or entering the Army, that discriminations would follow and that after the war those who through adventitious circumstances received commissions, would obtain for injuries received or disabilities incurred greater benefits and allowances than those who rendered as heroic and valiant service in the ranks as privates?

It is well known that tens of thousands of men, indeed hundreds of thousands, entered the Army as privates who were as competent to serve as officers as any who obtained commissions. In the beginning of the war thousands entered the officers' training camps. In the main, they were men of fine character, but there were hundreds of thousands in the Army serving as privates whose character and courage and ability were equally as great and who, if the opportunity to serve as officers had been afforded, would have been as competent as those who held commissions.

I am not disparaging the Reserve officers. Take them all in all, they were as fine a class of men as the world ever saw, and their services merit the commendation of their country. If any were injured or suffer disabilities by reason of their service, I shall vote generous sums by way of pensions or compensation; but I am unable to support a measure that treats them better than the privates who served in the Army. I repeat, there can be no justification for the discrimination in favor of the Reserve officers. Important as was their service, their brothers and friends and boyhood companions who were privates rendered equally heroic and important service.

Some time ago two young men—men who served in the Army as privates, both of whom were wounded—spoke to me in opposition to this bill. They denounced it as unjust and stated that the great body of the ex-service men who had not received commissions would regard it as unjustifiable discrimination. As I recall, one of the young men stated that his brother was a captain; that he had received a commission because it had been agreed between the brothers that one should attend the Officers' Training Camp and the other enlist as a private. The one obtaining the commission was no better, nor did he have greater ability, than the one who fought as a private. The captain, indeed, did not go overseas and had an easy position in some clerical branch of the service. The private received wounds upon the battle field. If the captain claimed and established disabilities of 30 per cent, he would be retired with three-fourths pay for life. The soldier who was wounded and whose disabilities, because of such wounds, were more than 30 per cent would have to be content with compensation of a few hundred dollars per annum allowed by Congress. And yet that is the kind of discrimination this bill legalizes.

Senators may defend this scheme, but I denounce it as unjust, unfair, and as a grave injustice to the 4,000,000 boys who served as privates in the World War.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. President—

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. HARRELD. I should like to ask the Senator if it is not true that the Volunteer officers of the Civil War have been trying for 25 or 30 years to secure in their behalf the enactment of just such legislation as that contemplated by the pending bill, and if it is not also a fact that Congress has consistently refused to pass that character of legislation affecting the Volunteer officers of the Civil War?

Mr. KING. That is absolutely correct. We not only have denied this to the Civil War Volunteer officers, but for years they were denied pensions or fair compensation for disabilities incurred in service.

Mr. HARRELD. I received a letter yesterday from an officer who served in the Civil War insisting that if the rule established by the pending bill should be applied to emergency officers of the World War, that likewise it should be applied to Volunteer officers of the Civil War.

Mr. KING. Why not?

Mr. HARRELD. I have received several letters of that kind; and I should like to ask is there any reason why the same rule should not apply to the officers who served in the Civil War that it is proposed to apply to those who served in the World War?

Mr. KING. There is no reason why it should not; and if we should amend the law and extend the right of retirement to officers who served in the Civil War, we ought to give them back pay; and if they are deceased, a strong argument could be advanced for the payment to their widows and dependents of the amounts which should have been paid during the lifetime of such deceased officers.

It would require tens of millions of dollars to meet such demands. How unimportant are the pensions and the compensations allowed to the Civil War veterans, though they total several billions of dollars, compared to the projects relating to those who served in the military and naval forces of the recent war. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] told us that the bonus bill would impose a burden of $75,000,000,000. He has not overstated the figures.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President—

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the pending bill only applies to disabled officers of the World War, and, under the restrictions of the bill, they must be 30 per cent or more permanently disabled. The bill does not apply generally to Volunteer officers, but only to those who were disabled.

Mr. KING. This bill provides retirement privileges for every officer, except Regular Army officers, who served in the World War, who may have 30 per cent or more disability—that is, if any ex-officer shall, during the year following the passage of this bill, claim that he is suffering from any disability resulting from his service, and such claim is upheld, he will be placed on the retired list and draw three-quarters pay for life—that is, three-quarters of the amount of the compensation allowed him in the grade of the service in which he served. He may be worth millions; he may be earning tens of thousands of dollars annually; he will nevertheless get all benefits and allowances and emoluments granted to Army officers of the same grade upon retirement.

There are now thousands of ex-officers who claim such disabilities and who are receiving compensation from the Government the same as the privates who are suffering from like disabilities. This bill lifts them out of the class in which they are now found; it doubles and trebles, in some instances, what they are now receiving. It gives to them special advantages over thousands of brave ex-soldiers who will be the victims of an unjust discrimination. I protest against it and plead for equal and exact justice for all.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. President, the Civil War officer to whom I have referred and who has written me, states that he would come within the rule, for he was disabled during the war, and for many years has been drawing a pension on account of disability.

Mr. KING. There were thousands if not tens of thousands of disabled Volunteer officers in the Civil War, and they have been denied for all these years the benefits and privileges which it is proposed now to give to the favored ones covered by this bill. We propose to separate the more than 200,000

Reserve officers from their brothers and companions and confer upon them superior advantages over those granted to the 4,000,000 ex-soldiers who served their country with as much zeal and fidelity as did those who held commissions.

The Civil War Volunteer officers who were wounded or incurred disabilities in the service not only were denied retirement benefits but received but a moiety of the compensation allowed by existing law to Reserve officers and ex-service men—privates—who served in the recent war. This is the first time in the history of our country that there has been a serious effort made to grant retirement privileges to Volunteer or Reserve officers.

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President—

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President, in connection with the question of establishing a precedent for the Civil War officers, which has just been brought up by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. HARRELD], permit me to inform the Senator that there are now only 91 Civil War officers drawing disability pensions. Therefore, if we should include the Civil War officers in the pending bill it would not be a serious matter, for under the restrictions and limitations contained in the bill only 91 Civil War officers would be permitted to take advantage of its benefits.

Mr. HARRELD. The point I was making was that the Volunteer officers of the Civil War have been making a fight for 20 years or more to secure the enactment of some legislation which would give them the status of retired officers.

Mr. BURSUM. I should be very glad to include the Civil War officers in the bill, for it would not be a serious matter. I have a statement from the Commissioner of Pensions as to the exact number who would be affected.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield on that point?

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I wish to say, in answer to the suggestion made by the Senator from New Mexico as to including the 91 Volunteer officers of the Civil War, or whatever the number may be, in this bill, that would not relieve the unfairness of the measure. Thousands upon thousands of them have died of wounds and disabilities during the years that have passed, and if we now, at this date, decide that immediately after a war Volunteer officers shall be favored, then we ought to give back pay to the descendants of all the Volunteer officers of the Civil War from the date of that war down to the present time. That would be the only way to do justice, if that would be justice.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, there is no purpose to do justice by legislation of the character of the pending bill, but in my view it can not be defended in morals or upon any principle of justice that should guide a great legislative body in dealing with serious and important questions.

The Senator from Nebraska is right. If this bill is passed, then Congress should, if it pretends to follow any course of honor and justice and consistency, immediately enact a law granting retirement privileges to the Volunteer officers of the Civil War. Those officers who are dead should be remembered, and their widows and children should receive the millions which they would have been paid in their lifetime if such legislation as this had been upon the statute books.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I should like to say, if the Senator will permit me—

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MYERS. That I think every bill which has been introduced in Congress since I have been a Member of it to retire Volunteer officers of the Civil War has been an age retirement bill, to retire them all on account of age and not on account of disability. Therefore there is no analogy whatever between bills of that character and the bill now pending, because the pending bill is a disability retirement bill and the others were not.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, with all due respect to my good friend from Montana, whose judgment is always so persuasive with me, he must overlook the fact that in the Civil War there were Volunteer officers who were wounded, Volunteer officers who suffered permanent disabilities. He knows that there were battles in the Civil War as well as in the World War, and that thousands of Volunteer officers in the Civil War suffered disabilities, but they never were able to obtain legislation—indeed, few of them asked for it in those days—which would give them retirement privileges. When they were well advanced in years doubtless some of them sought and obtained pensions, but they never got the great benefits provided by this bill for officers of the World War.

Mr. HARRELD and Mr. FLETCHER addressed the Chair.

Mr. KING. I yield first to the Senator from Oklahoma. Then I will yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. President, I am just informed that 10 years ago a bill of similar import to this was introduced in the Senate, proposing to give to the Civil War Volunteer officers the same status that it is proposed to give to these veterans of the World War, and that that bill was reported unfavorably and was defeated in the Senate. Now, my point is this: After those old men have lived and died and have been without the great advantage that we are seeking to give these new men, I do not think we ought to show the favoritism that we are asked to give to these new men.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President—

Mr. KING. I now yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I was going to say that, without any exception, all those officers of the Civil War who were disabled have been receiving pensions. The Senator from Utah says they never asked for any legislation of this kind. They may not have asked for just this kind of legislation, but none of them ever declined the pensions that were provided for them under the law. No pension is provided for the Volunteer officers or emergency officers in this war. We have provided no pensions for them. The pensions that the officers of the Civil War enjoyed they have enjoyed all these years, and they continue to enjoy them, and they probably amount to as much in the way of benefits as the retirement privilege granted in this bill. In this case, however, if these officers are allowed to retire as Regular officers are, on precisely the same conditions as to disability and all that sort of thing, they give up their insurance, they give up their compensation, they give up everything. They have no other compensation or allowances or benefits than simply those conferred by the retirement status, just as the Regular officers.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. HARRELD. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Florida to the fact that pensions were not granted for 21 years after the Civil War, and these soldiers may all be drawing pensions 21 years from now. We do not know.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from Florida certainly does not want to leave the impression that nothing is being done now for the wounded or disabled officers of the World War. They are getting the same compensation that their brothers and their comrades and their neighbors receive for like disabilities. I want the Senator from Florida when he visits his constituents to meet with some of the ex-service men who served overseas and upon the battle front as privates, and say to them, "Some of your relatives and companions who entered the service at the same time you enlisted were made officers or subsequently received commissions; it is true that some of them remained in the United States and held business positions or clerical stations or places in the quartermaster section of the Army. Some of you privates have been seriously wounded, many are suffering from disease and disabilities which incapacitate you from doing any work whatever; however, you are to be treated differently from these officers who may have 30 per cent disability; they are to be cared for for life; they are the favored ones and are to receive all retirement benefits, including three-fourths pay; that is, officer's pay of the grade in which they held commissions. You privates, though you were as competent to serve as officers as those who held commissions, can receive only a small pension or such monthly or annual compensation as Congress may from time to time provide."

Let the Senator speak thus to the his ex-service constituents in Florida and I predict that his welcome will not be as warm as he could desire.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question at that juncture.

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator made some reference a few moments ago to the fact, as he asserted, that the officers who were injured rendered no greater service than the privates, and much has been said here about that. Does the Senator contend that Gen. Pershing rendered no greater service than a private did? And does he contend that it is a discrimination because Gen. Pershing was paid more compensation during the war than a private was paid?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, it may be that the Senator from Montana and myself—and he is a very able man—are not rendering—and it may be that we did not render during the war—any better service than the man in the factory or in the field or upon the farm. We happened to be selected for positions in this body and we may receive slightly higher salaries, but so far as service is concerned, it may be determined that we rendered no greater service to our country than did the men who worked upon the farm to feed the armies who were defending the right, or were doing their duty as God gave them the light to see their duty in all parts of our land.

Mr. MYERS. I do not claim that I did; but if the Senator will permit me, if Gen. Pershing rendered no greater service than the private, why was he paid more?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator can not perceive any distinction between the position of the Volunteer soldier who served in the war and Gen. Pershing, then no explanation that I could make would prove enlightening to him. Permit me to observe, however, that those who volunteered or entered the Army as private soldiers by means of the draft were performing the temporary service which their obligations to their country devolved upon them. Indeed, they felt it an honor and a high privilege to be permitted to defend their country and the cause of civilization. Many who were not thus permitted to serve regarded themselves as having been denied a great privilege. There are millions of brave men who, because of age or some physical disability or other compelling reason, were unable to enter the Army. This fact they regret and always will regret, and they look with pride and reverence and deep affection upon those who were thus privileged to serve in the armies of their country.

With the termination of the war these young men returned to their homes and to the various fields of industry from which they had temporarily been separated. Their careers had not been blighted, their opportunities in life, generally speaking, had not been lessened. Indeed, the experiences obtained broadened and better fitted and equipped those receiving such experiences for honorable service and for great responsibility.

Of course, I am speaking of those who were not injured. There were many who did incur disabilities and whose lives have been marred. They should be the objects of tender solicitude by a generous Government. Those whose lives were sacrificed should be regarded with reverence and as martyrs to freedom's cause. Their dependents should be affectionately considered by a grateful people and by a Republic whose gratitude for faithful and heroic service is never exhausted.

Gen. Pershing entered the Army as a boy. He denied himself the avenues of civil advancement, of professional success, of business fame and wealth which comes to the fine American business man. Those who enter West Point as boys close every door to success. They enter a cell from which they may not emerge, and their lives, limited and circumscribed, call for the application of a different rule than that which would apply to men who serve for a short season only as officers in an emergency and who return to home and profession and private life and to the fields of industry and endeavor in which victories and rewards and triumphs are obtained.

I will say to the Senator that in my opinion Gen. Pershing's pecuniary condition at the end of a long and illustrious career will be less fortunate than hundreds of thousands of privates who fought in the World War and who are now back in the ranks of peace, where they are doing splendid service in the industrial and economic fields of our country.

Mr. President, I repeat what I have already stated, that the Reserve officers with fine patriotism and high devotion served their country. But they were our sons and our neighbors and a part of our home and community life. So also were the 4,000,000 privates.

Among my friends were two splendid young lawyers. They entered the Army as privates, and after nearly two years of valiant and honorable service in France they returned home—still privates. They were as capable of serving as officers as other lawyer friends of mine who received commissions, and some of whom did not cross the Atlantic. Would it be fair and just to say to the two ex-privates, "You shall not be entitled to the same privileges and benefits from the Government for your wounds and disabilities as those who were made officers, and by reason of illness while in the service have incurred disabilities rated at 30 per cent?"

I ask Senators if it is just and right to grant to an officer who for a few months was a colonel, and who by reason of the influenza, which attacked so many both in and out of the Army, incurred what is rated as a 30 per cent disability, a life pension of more than $3,000 per annum, though he has property of great value and is capable of following his former vocation and earning a large sum each year, and at the same time provide that his friend, who was a man of equal ability, can receive but $1,000 or $1,500 per annum, though he was wounded in battle and has disabilities rated at 90 per cent, simply because he was a private? This bill is designed to permit just such results.

If two brothers were officers, one a second lieutenant and the other a colonel, though the former were abler than the latter, and the lieutenant had lost both legs upon the battle field, he would receive less under this bill than would his brother, who was a colonel, and when disabilities resulted from sickness while engaged in some clerical work in Washington, but which caused 30 per cent disability.

Mr. President, we are informed that the number of Reserve officers who are now obtaining disability compensation is proportionately greater than the number of privates. Of course this is no criticism of the Reserve officers. I might add that the records show that the number of noncombatants who are obtaining disability compensation or allowances is greater, relatively, than the number of actual combatants. I make no comment in regard to this last stated matter, though it would appear rather incongruous and paradoxical. There are now a very large number of Reserve officers drawing compensation, considerably more than 5,000. One Senator, I am told, has stated—and I have been in committee meetings and have been denied the advantage of hearing the debate—that the cost of this bill would be only $1,000,000 a year, approximately. I am advised by one of the efficiency experts of the Government that immediately the cost will be over $4,000,000, and I have no doubt but that before the end of the year, if this bill becomes a law, there will be a situation which will call for annual appropriations very much greater than the sum mentioned. My information is that when there was passed through this body a bill which, as I recall, granted to naval officers the benefits that we seek to give here—and I concede that I did not know anything about it; I will not say how it slipped through—it was later repealed when the stupendous cost that would result to the Government was discovered. The number of naval officers seeking retirement under that bill was so great that in self-defense Congress was compelled to repeal the act; yet, with that example before us, we are proposing now to pass a bill under which the Government will, in my opinion, be compelled to pay in the next 25 years hundreds of millions of dollars.

I make the prediction, certain of its fulfillment, that if this bill becomes a law its terms will be extended, the one-year limitation will be repealed, and before many years have passed tens of thousands of Reserve officers will be enjoying all the retirement benefits. This bill if passed will, I am sure, cost the people of the United States tens and tens of millions of dollars.

It will create resentments and tend to array the privates against the officers. It will tend to perpetuate any differences that may now exist between those who served as officers and those who were privates. It will divide and not unite. It will harm and not benefit our country or our people. Mr. President, this is not the time to consider measures of this character. Let us address ourselves to all proper measures for the relief of the wounded and disabled; if they are not receiving sufficient then let us make additional appropriations. We can properly pay millions for the wounded, whether former officers or privates; they shall be regarded with affection and gratitude by the Nation, but there shall be no discrimination. All our brave sons shall be treated with equal and exact justice.

Mr. President, I now move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I only desire to say a word in reference to the pending bill.

I suppose everyone in the Senate knows that I am not in favor of the so-called bonus bill, because I do not believe that the pay is the compensation for service in the Army. Some months ago, however, when I made a statement in the Senate that I did not favor the passage of the bonus bill, and thought it was putting an undue and unnecessary charge upon the country at this time, I said that I was in favor of paying all necessary compensation to the wounded and disabled soldiers of the Great War. The status of the wounded man is very different from the status of the soldier who served with honor, but served without cost to his physical being. I do not mean monetary cost, because they were all taken away from their homes and their business, but I mean without cost in that the man came back sound and well, a perfect man.

At our order, at the order of Congress, these young men went to the battle front. They have come back where they are unable to take their places in the ranks of business life, to fight the battle of life on the same plane with their brothers. I think it is the part of a great Government to equalize, as far as it can, that difference in the status of these men caused by no fault of their own, but caused by their heroic service to their country.

I have listened to the debate on this bill, and the main argument seems to be that we should not support the bill, not because these men are not entitled to just compensation for the injuries they have received but because we have not done something for some one else, because Congress 60 years ago did not give what is said to-day to be just compensation to the wounded and disabled veterans of the Civil War.

I think the gentlemen who make those arguments are mistaken. I believe an earnest effort was made in the days that are past to take care of the soldiers of the Nation. Conditions were very different then. The cost of earning a living was very different in those days from what it is now. The soldiers of the Civil War were entitled to take up homestead lands without cost, when homestead lands were always worth a home, and sometimes worth a fortune. The conditions were very different.

The argument is that we should not pass this bill because we have not given as much to the private as it is proposed to give to the officer. I think we should do justice to the wounded private and give fair and just compensation to him, but his case affords no reason why we should pause now and refuse to do justice to the officer who came back home shot to pieces, left unable to fairly compete in the battle of civil life.

No man is eligible to go on this roll of honor unless his disabilities amount to 30 per cent. Is there a Senator on this floor who would sacrifice 30 per cent of his health, 30 per cent of his usefulness, for the compensation carried in the pending bill?

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. EDGE. Is it not true that under the existing pension system relating to officers and men who fought in previous wars Congress has never recognized any distinction between the officer and the man in providing for a pension for disability?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That may be true or not. As I said a moment ago, those who are opposed to this bill oppose it on the theory that somebody else has been wronged and not justly compensated. That does not appeal to my idea of justice, whether those who make that argument are right or wrong about it.

This may not be the best way to handle this situation, but here is the situation which confronts us. The law already provides that if a man served in the Regular Army of the United States and was disabled, he might be retired on three-fourths pay. Who served in this Great War on the front line, subject to disablement? Senators may try to answer that by saying it was the professional soldier, but it was not. Only 30 per cent of the West Pointers in the Army served in the Expeditionary Forces abroad. Very few men of the old Regular Army were disabled in the Great War. I do not say that in criticism of them. As far as I know, all of them were gallant soldiers. They were men who wanted to be in the front line, but their country kept them either at home for training purposes or promoted them to a higher rank where they were not exposed to the greatest danger, because it was thought that there they could serve best, and I have no doubt the conclusion was correct. But the men in the Army who were disabled in the Great War were the young men who were commissioned in the Regular Army, lieutenants and captains, from civil life, the great bulk of them men who graduated, not at West Point but at the training camps established during the war, just where these volunteer officers started.

Let us say that two of them graduated from the same training school; one was offered a commission in the Regular Army and the other a commission in the volunteer forces. Let us assume that the man who drew the commission in the Regular Army was disabled and is retired for life. His companion, who fought with equal gallantry and rendered equal service to his country, because he was not in the Regular Army is not entitled to recognition, it is argued.

I am not upon the Committee on Military Affairs. I am not an expert in military matters. I do not know whether the committee worked this question out in the most satisfactory way or not, but at any rate the bill comes before the Senate with the sanction of the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate, and I assume that they worked the problem out as they thought best. It is not an issue as to whether we are giving enough money to the private for his wounds and his disability; it is not an issue as to whether the soldiers of the Civil War received just compensation for their injuries and service during the war; it is a question as to whether these young chaps, whom you and I are responsible for sending to the battle fields of France, who had more than a third of their life's capacity to earn a living shot away on the battle fields in the service of their country, shall not receive just recognition.

I am not for a bonus bill. Men should serve their country as a patriotic duty. The man who served abroad and came home sound and well has an asset, not a liability. He has an asset of which any man should be proud—the glory of serving his country on the battle field. The man who came back shot to pieces is entitled to compensation from his Government.

One reason why I am not for a bonus bill to pay well men for their services is that I believe the dollars of the taxpayers of America should first be used to provide amply and sufficiently to take care of the wants and needs of those who suffered physical disabilities on the battle fields for their country.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, there appears to be a disposition in some quarters to pillory this bill and those who support it, which I can not understand. The opposition to it is intense and vehement, and I can not understand the reason for it. I voted in the Committee on Military Affairs, of which I have the honor to be a member, to make a favorable report on this bill in its present form. It was long and well and deliberately considered in the committee, and I voted with the majority of the committee to report it favorably, as modified, and nothing has occurred since then to change my mind about it. I was for it then and I am for it now, because I thought then and now think it a just and meritorious bill.

At the very beginning of the discussion in this country and in Congress about compensation for our former service men, away back at the time of the armistice, I declared that I was in favor of having the Government do everything within the bounds of reason for those of our former service men who were in any way disabled as a result of their service. I early declared that, in my opinion, we should be not only just to them but liberal and most generous. I am and long have been committed to the policy of doing for those former service men who were injured or disabled as a result of their service everything within the bounds of reason. Therefore, with me the only question is, Is this bill within the bounds of reason; is it a reasonable bill? If it is not a reasonable bill, I should not support it. If it is, I am committed to the policy of it.

I believe it would be very unreasonable to defeat the bill. I believe that reason and justice require that all of our former service men who were in any wise disabled as a result of their service should be treated like all others in the same class. All in the same class should be treated alike. That is the test of justice and reason with me in this matter. Then, the question is, How are others in the same class treated? If you treat some of a certain class in one way and others in the same class in another way, there is rank discrimination, and it is not right or reasonable. I think we should treat in the same way all who are in the same class.

As to the privates who did a great and glorious work in that war—and none would or could give them more credit, higher praise, or more sincere gratitude than I have ever given them—I say as to the privates who were disabled, privates who volunteered or were drafted are given the same compensation as the privates who served in the Regular Army. That is fair and right. I believe in it. There is no distinction or discrimination in their treatment.

Going another step, I say why should not the volunteer or emergency officer be treated in the same way, by parity of reasoning, as the officers in the Regular Army?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, the Chair calls attention to the unanimous-consent agreement which now goes into effect and which limits speeches to five minutes.

Mr. MYERS. I have, then, until 5 minutes after 1 to speak, I understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana may proceed for five minutes.

Mr. MYERS. If the emergency officers are not treated in the same way as the Regular Army officers in the way of compensation for disability, then there is discrimination as between officers who were disabled and privates who were disabled. I can see no reason why an officer who was not in the Regular Army should be treated differently from or compensated in a less degree for the same character of injury than an officer in the Regular Army. To do so would be rank injustice. I think as between the two the volunteer officer or the emergency officer sustained a greater sacrifice when he was injured than did the officer of the Regular Army. The officer in the Regular Army is taken in hand by the Government when he is a youth. He is sent to the Military Academy by the Government. He is there educated, supported, and equipped. He is equipped for life in every way. He is given an education by the Government. He is by the Government given a most valuable equipment. Everything is done for him and for his future career. He is provided for throughout life. He knows if he falls sick he will be taken care of; if he is injured, he will be put upon the retired list; he knows that when he reaches the age of 62 years he is to be retired upon a salary that will afford at least a comfortable living for him during the rest of his life. He is never required to enter into competition with his fellow beings in the strife of life, to build up a business, or to acquire a competence for his family. That is all taken care of.

On the other hand, the emergency officer who entered the war left a farm or a business of some kind or a professional practice. Most of them left families. Most of them were married men. They were nearly all from 25 to 45 years of age. I believe 45 was the maximum age which was allowed. There were very few who were under 25 years of age. They nearly all left families; they left farms or business establishments or professional practice. They nearly all volunteered. Much has been said here against paying them more compensation for their injuries than is paid to privates. Most of them sacrificed more than did privates. They were much older than the average private. Most of them were married and had families dependent upon them. The most of the privates were unmarried men. I say unhesitatingly the loss, the sacrifice, of the average wounded or disabled emergency officer was and is greater than that of the average wounded or disabled private.

Resuming my comparison of the sacrifice made by disabled emergency officers with that made by Regular Army officers, I say the emergency officers went into the Army training camps, they volunteered their services, and they exposed themselves to the same dangers, the same evils, the same hardships as the Regular officers. They left behind them their families, businesses, and professions. When the volunteer officer is wounded he has in most cases a family dependent upon him. He has left a business or professional practice to which he returns and which he finds greatly deteriorated, wrecked, or dissipated. He may have left a professional practice which has disappeared and gone to others. He finds that those who stayed at home have acquired what he abandoned for the good and welfare of his country. Undoubtedly, he is placed at a greater disadvantage than the Regular Army officer. Why should he not be treated in the same way, if injured as the result of his service? It would be gross discrimination in favor of class, in favor of caste, in favor of the Regular Army organization, if he were not treated in the same way for the same disability.

There were some most pitiful cases of disabled emergency officers that came before the Committee on Military Affairs when this bill was considered in committee. If those cases are not to be taken care of in the way in which this bill provides, I do not know what will become of them. It would be a gross discrimination and an outrage to see them suffer the neglect, the want, the disadvantages, the poverty which they would have to endure, and to see officers of the Regular Army, disabled in the same way but no more, provided for in ample and comfortable degree. Shall we stand for such discrimination?

More than that, there is another element of discrimination for our attention. The emergency officers of the Navy and of the Marine Corps who were disabled have been cared for by another bill in just such manner as this bill provides for disabled emergency officers of the Army. The provisions of that bill were continued in force only a year or two when it was repealed, but all emergency officers of the Navy and of the Marine Corps who were injured and desired to take advantage of it availed themselves of the benefits of it and, as the chairman of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs said on the floor of the Senate the other day, they have now acquired those benefits, are entitled to them in law, and they can not be deprived of them. Are we going to treat the emergency officers of the Army who were disabled in the great World War any less fairly than we treat the emergency officers of the Navy and Marine Corps who were disabled while in the service? What about that discrimination? Would it be just or right?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. MYERS. I yield, with pleasure, although my time is about to expire.

Mr. KING. I disagree with the Senator that those are rights of which they can not be deprived. They were not rights and we can deprive them of them, and we should do it. A bill will be introduced to deprive them of those pensions.

Mr. MYERS. I was simply taking the word of the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], chairman of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, as to the situation. If that be the case, if Navy and Marine Corps emergency officers who were disabled are to be deprived of the compensation heretofore voted them, then it ought to be done before we deny the compensation provided for by this bill. There are Senators who oppose this bill who will vote for a cash bonus for all former service men. They oppose this bill on the ground of the cost, but they will vote for a cash bonus to all, although it will cost the Government billions of dollars. I think they are highly inconsistent. Those Senators who intend to vote for a cash bonus to uninjured soldiers should first see that the disabled are adequately taken care of. My first concern is for the disabled men, be they privates or officers. Do our duty by them first. They have the first and highest claim upon us. I think we should attend to the wounded soldier first. That is my platform and policy. Humanity requires it, and of the disabled treat alike all in the same class.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Montana has expired.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I am convinced Congress owes it to the disabled men, both officers and men, to provide some additional fund apart from the the war-risk insurance, and that it is our duty to do so. However, I can not reach the conclusion apparently arrived at by the proponents of the bill that there should be a distinction between officers and enlisted men represented, as I understand, by the scale of salaries they received during service.

It is quite a different matter to consider a soldier disabled and a soldier in line of duty. Necessarily from the latter standpoint the distinction between officers and men must be made and recognized; but when a soldier, be he a private soldier or a noncommissioned officer or a commissioned officer, is disabled in line of service to the extent of a 30 per cent disability or more, and he is returned to society and then faces the obligations necessary to maintain himself and those who are dependent upon him, it seems to me most unfair that the question of rank should play much of a part in considering the remuneration to the disabled soldier or officer. He has received that disability in the service of the country; he then goes back to private life facing those responsibilities; he has been impaired according to the degree of disability and faces them unfitted, as he did not before he proffered his service to his Government.

I think this view is likewise well borne out by the present policy of the Government, referring to those who have been disabled in wars before the recent Great War. My attention has been drawn by the sponsor of the measure to a portion of an act which existed previous to 1861, and which referred to the veterans of the Mexican War and wars previous to that. Under the provisions of that statute rank was recognized and for disability pensions were given by the Government equal to a certain proportion of the regular pay up to and including the rank of lieutenant colonel. But apparently recognizing the unfairness of this viewpoint and of this policy, after 1861—I think I am correct in this statement—that section was repealed, or at least the present pension system in this country was adopted, and Congress since that time has not recognized rank but has granted pensions without any consideration of rank, apparently recognizing the injustice of the statute that prevailed previous to 1861.

So I repeat that, while I believe it is our duty to provide some additional substantial payments to the officers and men who have suffered the disabilities they have because of their service in the war, I feel convinced that the pending bill is resurrecting a recognition of a system long ago set aside, a system the injustice of which is perfectly apparent, it seems to me, and must have been to the Congress that repealed it. I sincerely trust that the Committee on Military Affairs will, in addition to rehabilitation work, in some consistent manner add to the possibilities of income in addition to the war-risk insurance, so that officers and men alike, disabled in the Great War, may receive a proper consideration from the Government, which they served so well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STANFIELD in the chair). The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to recommit the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll. The Assistant Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Glass	Myers	Smoot
Borah	Gooding	Nelson	Spencer
Brandegee	Harrell	New	Stanfield
Bursum	Harris	Newberry	Sterling
Cameron	Harrison	Norris	Sutherland

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] is necessarily absent on business of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The Secretary will proceed to call the roll on the motion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to recommit the bill.

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President, I hope the motion to recommit the bill, made by the Senator from Utah, will not prevail. This bill was considered for months in the Committee on Military Affairs; extensive hearings on it were had; the result of the best thought which the large majority of the committee were able to give to the bill has been given to the Senate. The bill should either be passed or defeated. The motion to recommit is simply a method of killing the bill off in an indirect manner, and I hope the motion will be defeated.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, is the Senate now proceeding under the five-minute rule?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes; the speech of each Senator is limited to five minutes under the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I hope the motion to recommit the bill will not prevail. I think there is every reason in justice and fairness why the emergency officers of the Army should be accorded the same treatment as that which is extended to the Regular Army officers. That is what is contemplated by the bill. The Regular Army officer who suffered injuries justifying his retirement under the law receives retirement compensation. The emergency officers who in action and in the service of their country served side by side with the Regular Army officers who suffered similar injuries should be accorded the same consideration and should be allowed the compensation provided for in this measure. If it is wrong to allow retirement to Regular Army officers, then it is the duty of Congress to repeal the law authorizing their retirement. If we do not repeal the law, if we permit it to stand and approve of the policy, then I can not conceive of any reason or any logical conclusion upon which we may base a denial of the same benefits to the emergency officers who suffered injuries and are incapacitated in the same way, due to their services during the recent Great War.

This is not an issue as between the question of the treatment extended to privates and that extended to officers. If it is desired to raise that issue, then you can claim that privates are already being discriminated against when the Regular Army officers are permitted to enjoy the advantages of retirement. Time and time again I have befriended the private soldiers. I believe that they are entitled to the same consideration as that accorded to officers. I recall that when the question of the compensation was before us, involving the rations to be allowed to those in the Army, I took the position that we should make more liberal allowances to the private soldiers and that we should make less liberal allowances to the officers. I repeat, however, this is not an issue between doing justice to the privates and doing justice to the emergency officers; it is a question whether or not we are going to discriminate against the emergency officers in favor of the Regular Army officers. So far as I am concerned, Mr. President, I believe that that discrimination should be corrected, and that the bill should be passed.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. President, the Senator from Florida argues that to fail to pass this bill would be a discrimination in favor of the Regular Army officer as against the emergency officer. My view of the situation is this: A while ago I called attention to the fact that for 21 years after the Civil War there was no provision made for pensions to the soldiers who fought in that war. It is true that subsequent to every war in which we have engaged no provisions have been made for the pensioning of soldiers for years thereafter, usually about 20 years after the war has ended.

What does this bill do? If this bill shall be passed, immediately the emergency officers who have suffered disabilities of 30 per cent will begin to draw pensions, for under this bill their retired pay will be nothing in the world but pensions. So we are in the attitude of discriminating against the privates, because in the case of the emergency officers who fought alongside of them, and who were, perhaps, not any better qualified to do service and did not perform any better service in the Army than the privates, we immediately make such officers eligible for pensions; but it will be 21 years, perhaps, before the privates are entitled to any such consideration. That is a discrimination against the privates for which I would not be willing to stand. Of course, if we are going to draw a contrast between the treatment accorded the emergency officers and that accorded the officers of the Regular Army, then there is some room for an argument such as that made by the Senator from Florida; but I do not see why we should discriminate against the privates who fought in the World War in order to try to equalize the advantages accorded to emergency officers and Regular officers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah to recommit the bill, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. RANDELL (when Mr. BROUSSARD's name was called). My colleague [Mr. BROUSSARD] is absent from the Senate on official business. If present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. JONES of Washington (when the name of Mr. CURTIS was called). The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] is necessarily absent on the business of the Senate.

Mr. DIAL (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. NICHOLSON], and, therefore, withhold my vote.

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], but I reserved the right to vote on this bill, and I vote "nay."

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. I understand that if he were present, he would vote as I am about to vote, so I feel at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. JONES of Washington (when Mr. KEYES's name was called). The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] is necessarily absent. If present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. NORRIS (when Mr. LA FOLLETTE's name was called). I have been requested to announce that the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent on account of a death in his family, and that if he were present he would vote "nay" on this motion. He is paired with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE]. If the Senator from Nevada were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. MOSES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD]. As he is absent, I withhold my vote.

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], who is absent. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. GERRY (when Mr. OWEN's name was called). The senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] is necessarily absent. If present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). May I inquire whether the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not voted.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have a pair with that Senator. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CARAWAY. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCKINLEY], but he has released me on this measure, and therefore I will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. KENDRICK. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK], which I transfer to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], and will vote. I vote "nay." If the Senator from Nevada were present, he would vote as I have voted on this question.

Mr. ERNST. I have a general pair with my colleague [Mr. STANLEY], but I am advised that on this question he would vote as I am about to vote, and I will therefore vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have just received a communication to the effect that I am relieved from my pair upon this particular question. I therefore vote "nay."

Mr. DIAL. I am unable to get a transfer of my pair. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] is paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], and that if those Senators were present the Senator from Nebraska would vote "nay" and the Senator from Wisconsin would vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS]; and

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK].

I also desire to announce that the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK], if present, would vote "nay" on this question.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] is absent on account of illness.

The result was announced—yeas 16, nays 49, as follows:

YEAS—16.

So the Senate refused to recommit the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

The amendment was amended was agreed to.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I desire to say a word or two in connection with this bill.

I, of course, am in favor of doing everything which it is possible and proper to do in the way of compensating and caring for the men who served so valiantly in our Army. I had hoped that when this measure came before the Senate I should be able to vote for it; but in view of the general situation in which we find ourselves and in view of the great financial problems which are confronting the country, I can not see my way clear to vote for the measure at the present time. Therefore it is with great regret, in the performance of what I feel to be my duty to the country at large, that I shall be compelled to vote against the bill, though I had hoped that we might find ourselves in such a situation that I should be able to vote for the bill and still be performing conscientiously what I see to be my duty toward the country as a whole.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, from the course of the debate on this bill it is very easy to have gotten a misapprehension in regard to its real nature. In fact, I had that misapprehension myself from some of the arguments at one period of the consideration of the bill.

It has been urged by some of the supporters of the bill that they are supporting it because the Volunteer and Reserve and temporary officers ought to be put upon the same basis as the Regular officers. I doubt very much whether such a bill as that, if it were presented, would be justified at this time. I myself should have very grave doubts about the propriety of casting a vote in its favor; but this bill does not do that. It is a much more limited measure. It only gives the benefits of the bill to the officers of the classes referred to who suffered disability to the extent of 30 per cent. That is not the law that relates to the retirement of Regular officers at all. It is much more circumscribed; and I think it is much easier, with consideration for the interests of the public and the condition of the Treasury, as well as generous and liberal treatment toward the men who came to the rescue of the country in the hour of its greatest need, to justify a vote for this bill than to justify a vote for such a bill as has been described by some of the proponents of this measure.

I think the bill has defects. I expect to vote for it; I think it is meritorious, on the whole; but I think it is defective, for instance, in classing all disabled soldiers upon the same plane and measure of compensation above 30 per cent. I think there ought to be some discrimination between a man who suffered 90 per cent or 60 per cent disability, when it comes to compensation for his disability, and a man who suffered only 30 per cent disability; but that grows out of the effort to use a retirement law as a disability measure. You can not very well make it fit. A more logical way to reach these cases, it seems to me, would have been through the increase of the disability compensation allowed, with a proper gradation of compensation to correspond to the varying degrees of disability, instead of putting them all into one class and giving all those disabled above 30 per cent the same compensation; but because it is limited to those who have suffered at least 30 per cent disability and because there is no other remedy proposed, I expect to vote in favor of the measure.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question in my time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. KING. As I understand the Senator, this bill means that if some person has suffered a disability, say, of 31 per cent, and is able to continue his work, supposing he is a merchant or a lawyer, or practicing some other profession; suppose also he is worth a million dollars, or worth $10,000,000, he is to be retired on three-fourths pay, and if he is a colonel he would be getting three or four thousand dollars a year out of the Government for the rest of his life, and earning perhaps large sums in his profession, and deriving large sums from his investments. That would be the situation if this bill should pass, would it not?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not know whether the Senator is correct about the exact amount a colonel would receive, but in principle he is correct, and in that respect it corresponds with all the legislation which Congress has ever enacted in behalf of disabled soldiers. There has never been any discrimination made between those who are wealthy and those who are poor. Compensation acts in relation to the soldiers of the late war with Germany are entirely without any differentiation between men of means and those without means. The compensation is based entirely upon the degree of disability.

Mr. KING. It would mean that the person with a 31 per cent disability would get as much as the individual who had a 99 per cent disability and was wholly incapacitated?

Mr. POINDEXTER. That would be the situation, and in that respect I think it defective. I pointed out that defect myself. I think I am the only person who did point it out.

Mr. KING. I am very glad the Senator did. I briefly alluded to it this morning. I am glad the Senator has emphasized it as an additional reason why this bill should not be supported.

I thank the Senator for replying to my question. Let me add just one word. If this bill becomes a law, then obviously after the one year provided in the bill has expired, if officers ask for relief and allege that they may trace their injuries to the war, we shall be compelled to repeal this time limit, and that will be done. I make the prediction now that within 15 or 20 years we will have paid out of the Treasury of the United States, under the terms of this bill, not $5,000,000, which the bill will cost next year, but we will have paid more than one hundred or two hundred million dollars. Of course, that amount, or even five hundred million, would be unimportant to the Senate of the United States and the Congress in the hysterical situation in which the country finds itself.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. REED. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES of Washington (when Mr. CURTIS's name was called). The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] is necessarily absent on business of the Senate.

Mr. DIAL. As the Senator from Colorado [Mr. NICHOLSON], with whom I have a general pair, would vote the same way as I do on this question I am free to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before of my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. I understand that if he were present he would vote for this legislation. So I feel at liberty to vote and I vote "yea."

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as on the previous vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of Washington (when Mr. KEYES's name was called). The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] is necessarily absent. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. NORRIS (when Mr. LA FOLLETTE's name was called). Repeating the announcement I made on a prior vote in regard to the pair of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], if he were present he would vote "yea," and the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE] would vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I make the same transfer of my pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] which I announced on the last vote, and I vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON]. I understand that if he were here he would vote as I do on this question, and I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CARAWAY. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. McKINLEY], but on this question he has released me and I vote "yea."

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to announce that the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] is paired with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], and if present the Senator from Maine would vote "yea" on this question. I also desire to announce that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORRICK] would vote "yea" if present.

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] is paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], and that if present the Senator from Nebraska would vote "yea," and the Senator from Wisconsin would vote "nay."

I also desire to announce that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE], and if present the Senator from Oklahoma would vote "yea."

Mr. RANDELL. My colleague [Mr. BROUSSARD] is absent from the city. He is paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES]. If present my colleague would vote "yea."

Mr. McKELLAR. I have a pair with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] and vote "yea." I am authorized to say that if the senior Senator from Kentucky were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. EDGE. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. ERNST. Making the same announcement as before as to my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 50, nays 14, as follows:

YEAS—50.

So the bill was passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill making eligible for retirement under certain conditions officers of the United States Army, other than officers of the Regular Army, who incurred physical disability in line of duty while in the service of the United States during the war."

EXTENSION OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA PARK SYSTEM (S. DOC. NO. 131).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation for the Rock Creek and Potomac Parkway Commission for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, in amount $200,000, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. NELSON presented a resolution adopted by the Minnesota Central Cooperative Live Stock Shippers' Association, South St. Paul, Minn., protesting against enforcement of the so-called packer control act in so far as said control affects public stockyards in Minnesota, and favoring amendment of the act to allow any State now having adequate control of public stockyards under State laws to be exempted from the provisions thereof relating to stockyards, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. CAPPER presented a resolution adopted by the Twenty-fifth Annual Convention of the American National Live Stock Association, favoring extension for 12 months from July 1, 1922, of the powers granted the War Finance Corporation vital to the interests of producers, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. WADSWORTH presented a petition of officers and employees of the Alderman-Fairchild Co., of Rochester, N. Y., praying for the passage of adequate protective tariff legislation based upon American valuations, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WILLIS presented a resolution adopted by the Cleveland Grays, an organization of Cleveland, Ohio, favoring the policy of reestablishing a Federal naval reserve force with a substantial unit thereof in or about Cleveland, Ohio, and also the granting of a Federal appropriation to provide an adequate naval reserve armory on the property already acquired and available for this purpose on the Cleveland lake front, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. JONES of Washington, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 133) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 507) thereon.

Mr. BALL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 14) providing for the election of a Delegate to the House of Representatives from the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 508) thereon.

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 3111) to authorize the collection in monthly installments of indebtedness due the United States by general prisoners restored to duty, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 509) thereon.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED.

Bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

Mr. CAPPER. On behalf of the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK], who is unavoidably absent, I introduce the bill which I send to the Secretary's desk.

By Mr. CAPPER (for Mr. McCORMICK):

A bill (S. 3177) declaring a portion of the West Fork of the South Branch of the Chicago River, Cook County, Ill., to be a nonnavigable stream; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts:

A bill (S. 3178) for the relief of George E. P. Mitchell; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SPENCER:

A bill (S. 3179) providing for the reservation of certain lands in New Mexico for the Indians of the Zia Pueblo; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. NORRIS:

A bill (S. 3180) granting an increase of pension to Susan Backus; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. STANFIELD:

A bill (S. 3181) to extend, continue, and further carry out the provisions of the Federal highway act approved November 9, 1921, and all other acts of and to which the same is amendatory or supplementary, and all other acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

By Mr. BRANDEGEE:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 165) authorizing the erection on public grounds in the city of Washington, D. C., of a statue of Edmund Burke; to the Committee on the Library.

By Mr. STANFIELD:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 166) to suspend the requirements of annual assessment work on mining claims during the years 1920 and up to and including June 30, 1924; to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

AMENDMENT OF INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MYERS submitted an amendment proposing that the Secretary of the Interior be authorized to expend $3,632.92 from funds held by the United States in trust for the Flathead Tribe of Indians in the payment of $2,250 due Swan Johnson on a logging contract, and $851 and $531.92, respectively, due Agnes and Paul Antoine, Flathead Indians, for stumpage, intended to be proposed by him to House bill 10329, the Interior Department appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, announced that on February 17, 1922, the President approved and signed the bill (S. 1831) to amend section 237 of the Judicial Code.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR LODGE (S. DOC. NO. 132).

Mr. SPENCER. I ask unanimous consent that an address which was delivered by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the Republican members of the Massachusetts Legislature on February 14 may be printed in the RECORD in regular 8-point type, and printed as a Senate document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

ADDRESS OF SENATOR LODGE TO THE REPUBLICAN MEMBERS OF THE MASSACHUSETTS LEGISLATURE FEBRUARY 14, 1922.

There are two points of a general character which I wish at the outset to bring to your attention. In the first place remember, and make other people remember, that the choice which lies before the voters next autumn is not between the Republican Party and some ideal organization which never makes a mistake but which passes laws, especially tax laws and tariffs, which please everybody, an organization which has never yet existed and never will exist. The choice before us is much simpler than that—very different—it is a choice between the Republican Party and the Democratic Party. Those two parties in a practical way are all you have to choose between. Therefore, when you are making your comparison you are not making it with counsels of perfection as against the Republican Party, you are making it as against the Democratic Party and nothing else, and, therefore, what the Democratic organization has done and promises to do is that with which the comparison must be made in determining how to vote. Now, the second point is this: The Democratic organization in Congress, and no doubt elsewhere, has been filling the air with the cry that this is a "do-nothing" Congress; that nothing has been done. That is easily said and its ease commends itself, of course, to the Democratic intelligence, on which it is not well to put too severe a strain. By every artifice of delay and time wasting they have done their best to make this Congress a "do-nothing" body, and although they have failed they are keeping on saying it just the same. The proposition, however, that this has been a "do-nothing" Congress is a statement I purpose to disprove, so far as time will permit this evening. In the first place, pause a moment and consider what the situation was which the Republican Party was obliged to take up when it came into full control of the Government less than a year ago. We had passed through a Great War, a war won not by any party organization, whether Republican or Democratic, but by the courage and quality of our soldiers and the enormous patriotic energy of the American people. It was a time when everybody was profoundly moved—it was a time of excitement. The American people were determined to win the war; they were ready to make any sacrifice in money to secure success. Although they are the most generous people on earth and did not question in that war time any appropriations or expenditures, they had a right to expect that the money they freely gave with both hands should not be spent needlessly or recklessly. Then the war ended and the excitement died down and in cold blood we began to look about us.

The tragedy was over, the lights were out, the music was hushed, and the country was left to contemplate what had happened in the calm of returning peace. It is an old saying that they who call the tune must pay the piper, but in this case, so far as the Government was concerned, the Democrats called the tune and, being rejected by the country, left it to the Republican Party when it came in to pay the piper. I had been in Washington, of course, through all those months of the war. I thought I knew something of the expenditures, something of the extravagance, but until the burden fell upon us I had no conception of the extent of the waste or of the amount of debt and wreckage with which we were obliged to deal. Three billion five hundred million dollars had gone to the Shipping Board, and we had to take over that financial wreck. We are making an endeavor to save from that wreck enough to secure the future of our American merchant marine, the difficulty of which can hardly be overestimated. We had spent three hundred and sixty-five millions on aircraft and we had not a single combat plane in France when the war closed. We had been using for our Air Service such planes as we could get from France and England. We had spent on artillery five hundred and eighty-two millions and we fought the war with French guns. When the war closed we had just begun to get machine guns of our own, on which many months had been wasted in experimenting and delays. We had bought supplies for the War Department with reckless profusion and had on our hands an immense surplus of every kind of material—copper, wool, food, clothing, and equipment of all kinds. If I had time to give you the details it would present a picture which you would find it difficult even to believe. All these results of reckless buying had to be disposed of. I mention only these as illustrations of the problems which confronted us on the 4th of last March. Figures are usually dull, but I am going to give you a few figures, which I think you will find both striking and picturesque. We gained control of Congress by the elections of 1918, and on the 4th of March, 1919, we had possession of both House and Senate. With the war still going on, on the eve of victory, as all men know, the American people had gone to the polls and changed a Democratic majority of 500,000 in the country to a Republican majority of 1,200,000.

Such a change of party under such conditions had never happened before and was really almost unimaginable, and yet the American people had voted in such a way as to make a net gain throughout the country for the Republican Party of 1,700,000. They were passionately thrilled by the coming victory, but were still calm enough to get rid of the Democratic Party as a necessary condition of peace and safety. The new Congress was hampered in its work because it received no help from heads of departments or from the administration, which was still in Democratic control. Now for the figures. They are not many and I think you will remember them: Despite the obstacles, the Republican Congress of 1919 reduced the appropriations $1,500,000,000 by making them a billion and a half less than the Wilson administration asked for in its last year and $13,000,000,000 less than was appropriated in the fiscal year preceding. This surely was doing something; but before I go on further I wish to call attention to the simple fact that one result of the war was to impose upon the country as a permanent appropriation a billion dollars to pay the interest on the debt incurred by the United States, and that interest account was within one hundred millions of the total appropriations for the Government for the year ending June 30, 1916. To be perfectly exact, the appropriations for that year were $1,114,000,000. The appropriations for the next year, ending June 30, 1917, when we had been in the war three months, were $1,625,000,000; for the year ending June 3, 1918, after one year and three months of war, the appropriations were $18,892,000,000. I think I am not mistaken in saying that these are figures that are not dull; but the next year we surpassed those that I have just read, for the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, were $27,065,000,000. Then the Republican Party came into power in March, 1919, and they repealed war appropriations aggregating more than $8,000,000,000. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, the first under a Republican Congress, the appropriations aggregated $6,495,000,000; and remember that the year before they had been $27,000,000,000. We have done something. For the next fiscal year, ending June 30, 1921, they were decreased by the Republican Congress to $4,780,000,000, and for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, $3,909,000,000, just short of $4,000,000,000. Something was done by somebody. Since the present Congress has been in they have reduced appropriations asked for by the departments of $5,337,000,000 by $1,428,000,000. This was the work of the present "do-nothing" Congress. This is partly owing to the fact that during the year ending June 3, 1921, 93,634 people were dismissed from the public service, and since the armistice 320,278 employees have been dropped from the civil pay rolls. Somebody did something.

Let me now call your attention briefly to what the "do nothing" Congress has done during the extra session, which began on the 11th of April and ended on November 23. We passed the revenue act of 1921. This was a very complicated and very difficult measure, involving a revision of the taxes imposed by the war legislation. It was absolutely necessary to raise a certain amount of money to meet the expenditures of the Government, and therefore there had to be taxes continued or imposed. The law has been severely criticized in certain quarters because there was not a larger reduction made in the income surtaxes. I should have been glad, personally, to have made those surtaxes lower than they were finally agreed upon, but we were compelled to get the money somewhere, and it seemed to the Republican majority of the Congress that the most important relief to be given to business and the country was by the termination of the excess-profits taxes. These taxes had greatly declined in amount, but still it was expected to raise by them some four hundred millions. It was also thought of the first importance to get rid of the transportation taxes on freight, passengers, and express packages, a direct burden on all the business of the country. That tax brought in two hundred and sixty millions. We were also anxious to repeal some of the smaller taxes on special articles, popularly known as the "nuisance taxes." We repealed many of them. Some of it was necessary to leave in order to get the necessary money. Now, as a general proposition no tax is popular and no bill imposing taxes is ever liked. In fact, as Senator Moses remarked, "The only generally satisfactory way of raising taxes would be to have them all paid out of the United States Treasury," an observation which will bear consideration. This bill, however, admitting the necessity of taxes, has really brought a large measure of relief from taxes to which little attention has been paid. The total reduction on the best analysis which can be made will reach $835,000,000 for the calendar year. This is a very large reduction in taxation, and I believe that, owing to the great savings that have been made and to the diminution of expenditures, we shall be able to make still further tax reductions in the next year. Consider this when you hear the parrot cry that Congress has done nothing.

We passed also the Budget act, which had been vetoed by President Wilson when sent to him by the previous Congress. Gen. Dawes, who has been placed at the head of the Budget Commission, has done very great work, in which he has had the most cordial support from the President, and the Budget system undoubtedly is going to lead to a permanent reduction in appropriations.

We also passed the emergency tariff for the benefit of the farmers, because our vast agricultural interests have suffered more severely from the rapid decline of prices than any other interest in the country.

We passed the Veterans' Bureau act, one of the first acts which were dealt with. This was the so-called "Sweet bill," which established a Veterans' Bureau, consolidating all the agencies charged with care and responsibility in behalf of the ex-service men. The appropriations of Congress for this purpose will be between four and five hundred million dollars, and the administration has also succeeded early in its career in greatly improving the service so all important to our disabled veterans. I quote what the President said in his message of July 12, 1921, in regard to it:

In the Department of War Risk Insurance there have been filed up to July 7, 1921, compensation and insurance claims numbering 813,442. Of these, 747,786 have been adjudicated at an expenditure of $471,946,762. There were 200,000 claims pending when the War Risk Department was reorganized late in April, this year, and the number of pending claims has been reduced by 134,344. All work in this department will be current by the 21st of this July; that is to say, all action which the bureau may take on a given case will be current, though new claims are being filed at the rate of 700 per day. There have been requested 887,614 medical examinations, and less than 14,000 await medical action. Up to July 7 there have been 26,237 disabled soldiers hospitalized, and in Government controlled hospitals to-day there are 6,000 available beds without occupants.

Something of vast consequence to our soldiers has been done here. We passed the immigration restriction act, made necessary by the enormous flood of immigration from Europe induced by war conditions and which was threatening to increase the large number of those unemployed in the country to a perilous extent. We passed the bill for twenty-five million addition to the farm loan; the naval appropriation and the Army appropriation, which came over from the previous Congress and which went through with large reductions; the act dealing in grain futures; the act regulating the business of the meat packers. Then we passed also for the benefit of our agricultural interests the war finance and agricultural loan act. This was an extension of the Finance Commission established during the war, which had been a marked success, in order to bring aid to the farmers by credits given on good security. We passed the Federal highway act; the maternity act, which provided for Government aid to the States in all efforts for the benefit of mothers and infants.

Legislation carrying appropriations was passed for the Shipping Board in our endeavor to save what could be saved from the vast wreck due to the wastefulness and extravagance of our predecessors. We amended the Edge Export Act to encourage and help our export business, and the cable control act, which regulated all cables landed in the United States. We have also passed a bill for the funding of the foreign debt to the United States. With accumulated interest it amounts in round numbers to $11,000,000,000. It is now in the form of national notes, notes of hand. It should be in some permanent form, which makes the legislation necessary. The United States has no intention of playing the part of a usurer, but this was the money of the American people which was lent to the allied and associated powers in their time of greatest need. The debts which the United States owed to those powers she has paid in cash and has questioned none of them. They were trifling compared to what the allied and associated powers owe to us. We are well aware that some, perhaps many, of the nations indebted to the United States can not now pay their principal or interest, but some arrangement must be made to place that great debt upon a businesslike basis, and to secure what is properly due to the United States and her people, for it was the people who lent the money by subscribing for their own bonds and giving the proceeds to the powers who were fighting Germany. This is another of the great and necessary measures which this Congress has passed. These are only the most important and comparatively few of the many bills passed by the extra session of Congress. The House also sent over the tariff bill, which is now in the Senate, and the Republican conference has voted to take up and pass immediately the soldiers' adjusted compensation bill, commonly known as the bonus bill, and has just passed the farmers' cooperative marketing act. I know that I am speaking within bounds when I say that no Congress in time of peace has ever shown such an amount of important, effective, and remedial legislation as has been enacted by the present Congress since it has been in session. One other thing we have done—not by legislation—to which I wish to call your attention. I will read you the prices of the United States bonds on the 4th of March last:

Liberty three-and-a-halves, 1932-1947	$90.92
Liberty first fours, 1932-1947	87.22
Liberty second fours, 1927-1942	87.00
Liberty first convertible four-and-a-halves, 1932-1947	87.22
Liberty second convertible four-and-a-halves, 1932-1947	87.04
Liberty third convertible four-and-a-halves, 1928	90.26
Liberty third convertible four-and-a-halves, 1928, registered	90.12
Liberty fourth four-and-a-halves, 1933-1938	87.18
Victory three-and-three-quarters, 1922-1923	97.50
Victory four-and-three-quarters, 1922-1923	97.50
Victory four-and-three-quarters, 1922-1923, registered	97.35

And here are the prices of those bonds to-day:

Liberty three-and-a-halves, 1932-1947	95.16
Liberty first fours, 1932-1947	95.16
Liberty second fours, 1927-1942	95.90
Liberty first convertible four-and-a-halves, 1932-1947	96.20
Liberty second convertible four-and-a-halves, 1932-1947	96.00
Liberty third convertible four-and-a-halves, 1928	97.12
Liberty third convertible four-and-a-halves, 1928, registered	97.20
Liberty fourth four-and-a-halves, 1933-1938	96.16
Victory three-and-three-quarters, 1922-1923	100.12
Victory four-and-three-quarters, 1922-1923	100.10
Victory four-and-three-quarters, 1922-1923, registered	99.96

The Republican economies, the Republican tax legislation, all the sound legislation which the Republican Party has enacted, and which has helped to stabilize business, has brought about this increase in the value of the United States bonds. For those who were forced to sell their bonds at a low price before they could complete their payments unhappily nothing can be done, but all who have held their bonds have had their value increased from 3 to 9 per cent. Consider this when you vote, and ask yourself whether you wish to go back to the price of bonds as they were left by the Democratic Party when the Republicans came into power on the theory that this has been a "do-nothing" Congress.

The cause, apart from steady Democratic obstruction, of the delay in the Senate as compared with the House arises from the fact that on the Senate devolves the ratification of treaties.

To us came the treaties concluding peace with Germany, Austria, and Hungary. It was high time that the technical state of war which still existed should be finally removed. There was a strong opposition in the Senate, almost wholly Democratic, to the ratification of these peace treaties, and I hope that you will remember, and that the people of Massachusetts will remember, that a majority of the Democratic Party tried to prevent the passage of these treaties, and voted to continue the technical state of war with Germany, Austria, and Hungary, which was wrong in principle, and a danger to the trade, commerce, and business of the United States.

Now, if you will indulge me, I should like to ask you to come with me into a field larger even than that of the domestic problems and policies of the United States. I wish to bring before you for a few minutes the International Conference for the Limitation of Armaments and for the Far East, which concluded its labors a week ago.

This conference, as the world knows, was called by President Harding. It was a great service, in my opinion, to the peace of the world, and is an integral part of the principles which have guided the President during his year in office. He has been devoting himself and his administration to the utmost in an effort to improve the conditions left by the war in the United States and in the world at large. The task is enormous and difficult to a degree which only those who have been brought face to face with it can realize.

The war left behind it a wrecked world. Millions of the strongest and best of the youth of the western world perished in battle; business was shattered, and the purchasing power of all the great markets of Europe was almost destroyed. Only the slow-moving hand of time will cure all the losses caused by the frightful convulsion of four years. It is our part as a nation to do the best we can to make better these terrible conditions, and the situation appeals to President Harding with peculiar force, for he is a man who has the right to say, as Abou Ben Adhem said to the angel, "Write me as one who loves his fellow men." As the long procession of people, with an endless variety of cares and sorrows, joys and hopes and desires pass before him day by day, the deepest thought in his mind, whether in small matters or large, is to try to help others wherever he can, and to increase the happiness not only of those whom he sees but of his entire country. The courage to do what is right, the determination to do his duty to his country at all hazards, are there and will not fail, but President Harding's dominant impulse is to try to make the world, so far as he can do it, a better place for men and women to live in. This has been behind all his domestic policies, and this was the moving influence in his call for the conference. The President does not believe in alliances for the United States—alliances which are backed by force and accompanied with penalties. He stands firmly on the great Washington tradition that the United States should have no permanent alliances, but he also believes that the United States, free and unhampered, can thus be of greater service than in any other way to humanity and to mankind. His desire is to do what can and ought to be done by appealing to what is best in the nations, to the right feeling of men and women, and by getting them to agree together, with no alliances, no provisions for war in the background; to do what is right to reduce the burden of armaments and promote the cause of peace. For these reasons, and moved by these impulses, he summoned the conference, sent his representatives to it, and the results are now before the world.

Neither you nor I have time to-night to go into the details of the great and difficult work upon which the conference has been engaged for 12 weeks. They are very interesting and important, those details, and I shall hope to explain them later and with some fullness to the people of Massachusetts, but here and now I am merely going to ask you to look with me on some of the great results which the conference has achieved, for I think they are really great results.

The American delegation consisted of Mr. Hughes, the Secretary of State; Mr. Root, Senator Underwood, and me. Mr. Hughes's services as head of our delegation and presiding officer of the conference can not be overestimated. He was wise, tactful, patient in the highest degree, and unrelenting in his labors, which were very heavy. He was masterly in his treatment of every subject and showed himself to be a statesman of the first order. The entire American delegation, I may say, worked together as one man from the beginning.

Both parties were represented on the delegation, and no word of party or politics was ever heard in our deliberations. We were there simply as Americans representing the United States. We discussed every subject from every point of view. We never had a difference of any kind. We stood absolutely together in our efforts for what we believed to be for the highest interests of the United States and of the world of men outside our gates. We were restricted in our jurisdiction, of course, by the terms of the President's invitation. Our three great objects were the limitation of armaments, the termination of the Anglo-Japanese alliance, and to obtain all we could for the benefit of China, in which the dominant feature was the return of the Province of Shantung. In all three of these objects we were successful. I do not underrate in the least the earnest good will and cooperation that we received from all our colleagues representing the other nations, but the lead in the conference belonged to the United States, because we issued the invitations, and that lead we took and held throughout. Almost every proposition, certainly all of any importance, was brought forward by the American delegation.

Land armaments could not be limited, because the situation of France was such that she felt it was necessary for her safety to maintain her present land forces. Therefore our exertions were confined to naval armaments. Mr. Hughes opened the conference on November 12 with his masterly presentation of the proposition, which the American delegation had been working over for weeks previously, in regard to the reduction of naval armaments. I do not exaggerate when I say that the presentation of the American plan startled the world. People had expected much, no doubt, but they were surprised by the boldness, the clearness, and the practical character of the American proposition. In the main that proposition prevailed. In the most essential points it entirely prevailed. We so reduced the number of capital ships that at the end of 10 years Great Britain will have 15 ships, the United States 15, and Japan 10. The United States now has 33 capital ships, Great Britain 41, and Japan 21. The capital-ship tonnage of these powers at the present time is: The United States, 728,390 tons; Great Britain, 1,015,825 tons; Japan, 494,528 tons. At the end of 10 years the United States will have 525,000 tons of capital ships, Great Britain 525,000 tons, and Japan 315,000 tons.

The United States made a great and generous offer. The capital ships which we abandon, convert, or destroy number 28, and they represent an expenditure of $330,000,000. No nation has ever before made such an offer as that. Great Britain met it and Japan met it. A large proportion of the Navy of Great Britain had been already scrapped since the war, but that did not affect the reduction. This great reduction in capital ships is the feature of the conference work which has most impressed the world. It is the most spectacular part of the work and is of very great importance, and yet it is not so important as other provisions of the naval treaty, to which comparatively little notice has been paid.

We have provided for a naval holiday, which runs to 1947, during which only ships for replacement can be built, and, most important of all, we have limited the tonnage, not only of capital ships but of auxiliary ships, and we have limited the caliber of the guns for all vessels. Pause a moment and think what that means and you will see why it is most important. It means the end of naval competition. It will no longer be necessary for any nation to be continually increasing her ship tonnage and her gun calibers in order to keep abreast of or pass her neighbor. This naval treaty, upon which our Navy must be based and continued, means a relief, not so much at the moment as in the future years, from the great burden which has rested upon all maritime nations because of great naval armaments. It will help also to maintain the peace of the world. So much for our first object.

By what is known as the four-power treaty, signed by the United States, France, Great Britain, and Japan, we terminate the Anglo-Japanese alliance. That alliance was a breeder of suspicion in North America, both in Canada and the United States. It had an unfortunate effect in Asia. It offered a soil in which the seeds of war might easily grow. It is gone. And that treaty, which relates only to the insular possessions and dominions of the four powers in the Pacific, merely provides that we shall respect each other's rights in such possessions and dominions, and that if controversies arise we shall consult before taking any further measures. There is no alliance in it; no military or naval force is hidden anywhere in those simple paragraphs. The only obligation we assume is that of consultation, and when the consultation has been held each nation that was in it, each party to the treaty, is as free to do what she thinks right as she was when she entered the doors. The treaty rests on the good intentions, the better feeling of nations, and on the world-wide desire that our children may be spared from the horrors which were poured out upon us in the war with Germany. That is the second result of the conference. Now as to the third.

The United States refused absolutely to accept the propositions in regard to Shantung in the treaty of Versailles and believed then, and believes now, that that Province should be controlled by China, of which it has always been a part. But of the other eight powers at the table in Washington six had ratified the treaty of Versailles and had accepted that clause relating to Shantung. Therefore, the only way to get that wrong undone was to bring about negotiations between Japan and China directly. This was effected by the good offices of the United States, represented by Mr. Hughes, and of Great Britain, represented by Mr. Balfour. The result has been that Shantung goes back to China practically unburdened. The only hold retained by Japan is a traffic manager on the railroad, appointed by and under a Chinese director. China is to buy the railroad with her own treasury notes. The notes are to run for 15 years, and in 5 years they can be redeemed. In the meantime, within six months, Japanese troops will all be withdrawn from Shantung and China will have her oldest and most sacred Province once more within her own hands. England announced on the conclusion of this treaty that she would return to China the port of Wei-hai-wei, which was held under a lease, and that will clear the Province entirely from any foreign hold.

In addition to that we signed a treaty negotiated by the nine powers, agreeing to respect the administrative, territorial, and political integrity of China. There are clauses in it providing also for neutrality and for the open door, all most beneficial to the Chinese Republic, as are a number of other declarations agreed to by the conference in regard to foreign post offices, foreign troops, and matters of that character which now hamper and shackle China in her effort to establish herself again, regain peace, and secure her independence.

I think this is a great work. It will help to relieve the burden of taxation and, in my opinion, to promote the peace of the world. And we all owe this to the wisdom of President Harding in summoning that conference.

When they say that the Republican Party, which has not yet been in power for one year, has done nothing, after you have reviewed what Congress has accomplished, call attention to this conference, where more has been done in 12 weeks for the world's peace than has been done anywhere else in twice as many years. These are questions which rise above the region of politics; both parties were represented on the delegation and worked together for a common purpose, but the fact nevertheless remains that it was under a Republican President that steps have been taken under which a thoroughly American policy has been carried out in the conference at Washington by a delegation representing both political parties, with a success which is recognized by the entire world.

Let us make our case clear to the people of Massachusetts. Let them know what we have done—what we have done in Congress, what we have done in international affairs, and why we have done it. We have a record worthy of the party. I know that much remains to do, although much has been done, but on what has been done we ought to stand together as one man and ask for the approval of the men and women of Massachusetts. The party in power is always blamed, not only for its errors but for events and conditions which no party can control; but we found the worst situation economically which any party in this country has ever been called upon to face, and we have a right to be proud of our record. We are entitled to stand by it ourselves without fear or misgiving and to ask all reflecting men and women to join with us. Let us stand together shoulder to shoulder, close up the ranks, pay no heed to outcries of our political opponents, go forward in the old Republican way, and carry on.

LETTER BY SENATOR SHIELDS.

Mr. KING. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, in regular 8-point type, a letter written by the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], dated February 15, 1922, to Mr. Philip Cole, commander of Davidson County Post, No. 6, of the American Legion, Nashville, Tenn. It is upon the very live and acute question of adjusted compensation. I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD in the regular RECORD type.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The letter is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 15, 1922.

Maj. PHILIP COLE,
Commander American Legion, Davidson County,
Post No. 6, Nashville, Tenn.

MY DEAR SIR: I have your letter, urging me to support the adjusted compensation bill, commonly known as the bonus bill, now pending before the Finance Committee of the United States Senate.

I have given this bill careful and deliberate consideration, and I regret that my conclusions of my duty as a Senator to the ex-service men and the entire people are such that I can not comply with your wishes in the matter.

I agree with you that the services of the ex-soldiers in the defense of their country and their patriotism can not be priced or paid for in money, and I assure you that I will always favor giving them the "square deal" you advocate. What particular basis upon which you urge the proposed legislation you do not state, and I can only give you the facts and reasons upon which I feel it my duty to vote against the measure.

The distribution of large sums of money or conferring other benefits upon special classes, by taxation collected from the people, is dangerous in policy and unsound in principle, and difficult to justify other than in great emergencies, in the absence of a direct mandate from the people, but I am not resting my opposition to the bill upon this ground.

Congress when making great appropriations for any purpose to be paid by relentless taxation should carefully consider the benefits to be conferred upon the particular class and the ability of the people to pay the necessary taxes. The benefit should be in some reasonable proportion to the hardships of the exactions and amount involved and the financial and economic conditions of the country.

What is the proposed legislation, the magnitude of the appropriation carried, the benefits conferred, the condition of those who will have to provide the money and their ability to do so at this time?

The grand total of the officers and men enlisted in the American Army in the World War was 4,650,500, of whom 2,083,865 served overseas and the remainder were in cantonments in the United States. The average service December 1, 1918, overseas was five months, and of entire Army, overseas and domestic, about nine months. The casualties of the American Expeditionary Forces show that 77,698 lost their lives in the service, and of these 50,403 were killed or died of wounds received in action and the others of disease or other causes. There were 197,922 who received wounds of more or less severity, and many thousands returned broken in health, all of whom are receiving and will receive as fast as possible the assistance of a grateful Government and people. The others are young men, selected because of their character, vigor, and strength, and are of the highest type of citizenship.

The Government of the United States, for the defense of our country in the war which Germany was unjustly waging against us and for the comfort, support, and equipment of our magnificent Army, appropriated and provided many billions of dollars, collected from the people by immediate taxation and raised by the sale of bonds. The people, with few exceptions, worked, produced, economized, and saved as never before that they might pay the taxes and purchase the bonds of the Government in their earnest and sympathetic desire to provide for the comfort of their brave defenders. Great sacrifices were made, thousands borrowing the money to make their bond purchases, to pay which they afterwards sold the bonds at a discount without complaint. The patriotism of the American people was aroused to the highest pitch, and no one can deny that they did their share and discharged their full duty. While our soldiers and sailors suffered the hardships inseparably incident to Army life and war, they were the best clothed, fed, housed, paid, and equipped of any army of any age that ever went out to battle.

The United States yet has outstanding bonds, which were issued for war purposes, aggregating $23,000,000,000, over $6,000,000,000 of which will mature and have to be paid or funded within the next 15 months. This just indebtedness and the annual interest thereon of $1,000,000,000 must be met and promptly paid by taxation of the people and the credit of the Government maintained.

The annual expenses of the Federal Government are now about $4,500,000,000, compared with $1,200,000,000 previous to the war. The Federal Treasury is well-nigh exhausted and faces a probable deficit of not less than $300,000,000 in the next two fiscal years, notwithstanding that many of the war taxes continue in force. The State and municipal taxation in perhaps every State of the Union, and especially in Tennessee, is greater than ever before imposed. The people of the United States, it is conceded, are staggering under a burden of taxation unprecedented and which would be hard to bear in prosperous times.

The economic and financial condition of the business, industrial, agricultural, and labor interests are demoralized, depressed, and suffering, never before surpassed in the history of our country. Mines, mills, and factories are idle. Millions of acres of grain and cotton plantations go uncultivated, and raising live stock is being abandoned, all because the cost of production is greater than the market value of the products. There are thousands of men unemployed because of this cessation of business and depression of our industries. The farmers of the country are not only unable to meet their obligations for supplies and labor but many of them are compelled to borrow money to pay taxes.

The adjusted compensation or bonus bill which the American Legion is now asking the Congress to pass it is estimated will call for the stupendous appropriation of from $2,000,000,000 to $5,000,000,000 to the surviving ex-service men—the strong, the prosperous, the wounded, the diseased, and the disabled alike. The cash bonus to be paid in quarterly installments of $50, which, according to common experience, will be of meager benefit.

Congress should not pass the bill without providing means for the payment of the cash bonus; to do so would be a hollow mockery, a false pretense, and a fraud upon the expectations of the American soldiers, and the Congress would be open to the charge of resorting to a flimsy expedient, devoid of benefit, to deceive the ex-service men and exploit their suffrage in coming elections.

There are but two ways by which the means to pay the cash bonus could be provided, and these are increased and drastic taxation or the issuance of short-time interest-bearing bonds, and both are practically impossible.

The people can not, in the depressed condition of the country bear further taxation. They should not in times of peace be subject to greater exactions than in war. They should not, when in industrial and financial distress and depression, be subjected to further taxes for the benefit of any one or any particular class. The taxes that have been proposed would fall upon the whole people, including the ex-service men and the fathers, mothers, and widows of their comrades who lost their lives upon the battle field or the agonized bed of disease in foreign lands.

The sales tax is the most unjust of all those proposed, as it would operate to exempt wealth and fall heaviest upon the people in moderate means, for which reason Congress rejected it a few months ago. It is easy to understand the interest that is seeking this opportunity to have it imposed, with the hope of making it permanent in our taxing system.

The further increase of the bonded indebtedness of the Government will be equally disastrous to the country in its depressed condition. It is doubtful whether such a stupendous sum can now be floated, in the absence of the enthusiasm and patriotism which impelled the people to buy bonds during the war—certainly not unless they bore an exorbitant rate of interest. The consequent inflation would depreciate the value of the present securities of the Government and make it difficult, if not impossible, to refund the $6,000,000,000 maturing in the near future, and, in the opinion of those best able to judge, further unsettle and demoralize the business of the country. It is certain that the increase of taxation or the further issue of Government bonds would cause greater depression and stagnation in business and delay in the restoration of affairs to normal conditions and prosperity. The ex-service men would be equally injured, as they can not be prosperous when their neighbors and their country are in distress. The merit of the legislation is not commensurate with the evil that it will cause.

The proposition to pay the bonus out of the interest and principal to be collected from our associates in the late war on account of the loans we made to them is without merit and impracticable in execution. Those who advance this proposition must know there is no hope of the immediate collection of this foreign indebtedness and that collection in the future is problematical. Some, if not all, of the debtor nations will not for years be in a condition to make payment, and, although they are indebted to our Government and our people in the aggregate more than $16,000,000,000, they are calling upon us for further credits and further loans. More than this, they feel under little obligation to make payment and believe that we should cancel this just indebtedness as a contribution toward the common war expense. Again, the acts of Congress which authorized these loans pledge them for the payment of the Liberty loan and other bonds which were issued and sold to raise the money so loaned, legislation contractual in its nature, which can not without a breach of faith be violated.

There is another consideration which weighs heavily with me and adds to my objection to this legislation. The Congress must provide for the comfort, cure, support, and maintenance of the wounded, diseased, and disabled ex-service men. Their comrades who came through the war unscathed will imperatively insist upon this and will not, as I believe, ask for any measure that would embarrass Congress in performing this duty. The Congress has already appropriated and paid out for the benefit of these unfortunate men more than $1,500,000,000, the appropriation for the present year being about $450,000,000, and increasing sums will be required each succeeding year. The applications of those who are broken in health and diseased physically or mentally are coming to the Veterans' Bureau by thousands, and there are now on file more than 1,000,000 of such applications. The indications are that the demands upon the Treasury of this kind will soon amount to billions of dollars, several times more than was necessary to pay the annual expenses of the National Government previous to the war. I favor appropriations without limit for this purpose.

It requires no argument to convince anyone that an appropriation of from $2,000,000,000 to $5,000,000,000 now to the ex-service men, strong and in good health and in the main prosperous, would greatly embarrass the Government in taking care of their comrades, who deserve and must have the first consideration of the Government. The people of the United States have, I am sure, and I know I have, the greatest admiration and gratitude for the American soldier who jeopardized his life in the defense of the sovereignty and independence of his country and the liberty and happiness of the American people. They will, in my opinion, be ready and willing to do what conditions and opportunities may permit to express this gratitude substantially and effectively, but this is no time for what is now proposed. I can not ignore the financial condition of our Government, the distressed condition of the people, and the necessities of the wounded and diseased soldiers; and, for the reasons herein expressed, I am compelled to oppose legislation which proposes the appropriation of such stupendous sums of money, to be taken from the pockets of a people suffering from economic troubles and oppressive burdens of taxation.

With kindest regards and best wishes, I am,

Very truly, your friend,

JOHN K. SHIELDS.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9060) to authorize the Secretary of War to lease a certain tract of land to the city of Leavenworth, in the State of Kansas.

The message also announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 42) extending the thanks of Congress to the State of Florida for the statue of Gen. E. Kirby Smith, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 8342. An act to empower the Attorney General of the United States to fix the compensation of clerks of the United States district courts;

H. R. 9235. An act providing for a grant of land to the State of Washington for public park purposes;

H. R. 9499. An act to authorize the State of Idaho to exchange certain lands heretofore granted for public-school purposes for other Government lands;

H. R. 9710. An act authorizing extensions of time for the payment of purchase money due under certain homestead entries and Government-land purchases within the former Cheyenne River and Standing Rock Indian Reservations, N. Dak. and S. Dak.;

H. R. 9717. An act to amend the act entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish certificates in lieu of lost or destroyed discharges," approved July 1, 1902;

H. R. 9979. An act to amend an act entitled "An act granting a charter to the General Federation of Women's Clubs";

H. R. 10003. An act to further amend and modify the war risk insurance act;

H. R. 10007. An act for the relief of certain persons to whom, or their predecessors, patents were issued to public lands in the State of Minnesota under an erroneous survey made in 1876;

H. R. 10161. An act authorizing the use of special canceling stamps in certain post offices;

H. R. 10185. An act authorizing the exchange of lands within the exterior boundaries of the Malheur National Forest, in the State of Oregon, and for other purposes;

H. R. 10196. An act to provide for the applicability of the pension laws to certain classes of persons in the military and naval services not entitled to the benefits of article 3 of the war risk insurance act as amended;

H. R. 10297. An act to extend the limitations of time upon the issuance of medals of honor, distinguished service crosses, and distinguished service medals to persons who served in the Army of the United States during the World War;

H. J. Res. 257. Joint resolution to appoint a commission for the exchange of sites for a post-office and courthouse building at New York between the Federal Government and the officials of the city of New York; and

H. J. Res. 268. Joint resolution extending the operation of the immigration act of May 19, 1921.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

S. 29. An act authorizing the Secretary of War to grant to Lloyd E. Gandy, of Spokane, Wash., his heirs and assigns, the right to overflow certain lands on the Fort George Wright Military Reservation, at Spokane, Wash., on such terms and conditions with respect to improvements to be made on the present target range as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, or in lieu of such improvements to be made on the present target range the Secretary of War may accept a conveyance to the United States of such other lands to be designated by the Secretary of War as may be deemed suitable for a target range in exchange for such overflow lands; that to facilitate the acquisition of the necessary additional lands the Secretary of War is authorized to condemn land necessary and suitable for target-range purposes, such condemnation to be at the expense of said Lloyd E. Gandy, grantee, his heirs and assigns;

S. 52. An act for the relief of the Stevens Institute of Technology, of Hoboken, N. J.;

S. 561. An act to grant citizens of Washington and Kane Counties, Utah, the right to cut timber in the State of Arizona for agricultural and other domestic purposes;

S. 901. An act for the payment of certain money to Albert H. Reynolds; and

S. 1247. An act for the relief of Frank Carpenter.

HOUSE BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS REFERRED:

The following bills and joint resolutions were severally read twice by title and referred as indicated below:

H. R. 8842. An act to empower the Attorney General of the United States to fix the compensation of clerks of the United States district courts; and

STATUE OF GEN. E. KIRBY SMITH.

The concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 42) extending the thanks of Congress to the State of Florida for the statue of Gen. E. Kirby Smith was referred to the Committee on the Library.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that the Chair may lay before the Senate the legislative appropriation bill which was laid aside last night, to consider the one subject that is left on page 31.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10267) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The first amendment passed over will be stated.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations passed over was, on page 31, line 14, under the subhead "Library Building and Grounds," after the word "superintendent," ent," to strike out "$3,600" and to insert "who shall act as disbursing officer, as now provided by law, $3,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 31, line 20, in the items for Library Building and Grounds, to strike out "two carpenters, at $900 each; decorator, $1,400; painter, $900."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 32, line 1, in the items for Library Building and Grounds, to strike out "chief engineer, $1,500; assistant engineers—one $1,200, three at $900 each; electrician, $1,500; machinists—one $1,000, one $900; two wiremen, at $900 each; plumber, $900."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 32, line 4, in the items for the Library Building and Grounds, before the word "elevator," to strike out "three" and to insert "four," so as to read "four elevator conductors, at $720 each."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 32, line 5, to reduce the total of appropriations for the Library Building and Grounds from "$92,265" to "$76,785."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 32, line 6, at the end of the items for the Library Building and Grounds, to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That said employees shall be appointed by and be under the direction of the Librarian.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 32, after line 7, to insert:

LIBRARY BUILDING (UNDER ARCHITECT OF THE CAPITOL).

For chief engineer, $1,500; assistant engineers—one $1,200, three at $900 each; electrician, $1,500; machinists—one $1,000, one $900; two wiremen at $900 each; plumber, $900; decorator, $1,400; two carpenters at $900 each; painter, $900; in all, $15,600: Provided, That said employees shall be appointed by and be under the direction of the Architect of the Capitol, who shall contract for, superintend, and have charge of all structural work in the Library Building, including repairs, shall provide therefor all furniture and equipment, and shall direct the operation of the mechanical plant.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The committee amendments are completed. The bill is as in Committee of the Whole and open to further amendments.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before the committee amendments are finally disposed of may I inquire of the Senator from Wyoming if he will do me the kindness to direct my attention to the amendment with respect to the Library?

Mr. WARREN. It is found on page 31 of the bill.

Mr. KING. I have been engaged in committee work and just entered the Chamber. My attention has been called to this amendment by a Senator who was compelled to leave the city, and at his request I am challenging the attention of the Senate to it.

Under the head of Library Building and Grounds there is an item, "superintendent, who shall act as disbursing officer, as now provided by law, $3,000." The contention was made, as I am advised by this Senator, that this is new legislation.

Mr. WARREN. It is cutting down the amount from $3,600 to $3,000.

Mr. KING. Is it increasing the power of the superintendent so that he may have control over other officials which in the past he did not have?

Mr. WARREN. The provision that is made here is to confine the work to two men instead of three. The superintendent has had charge of some of the engineering, but the real management of the engineering part of it is where it belongs, with the Architect of the Capitol, because the building is lighted and heated and given electric power from the main United States plant. The other part of this division of employees is put under the Librarian proper, because it refers to the Librarian's work. It is entirely satisfactory, as I understand it, to those who first raised the question as to what it all meant. The item was passed over last night, as the Senator knows.

Mr. KING. No; I did not know that.

Mr. WARREN. There were three or four Senators who, last night, wished this to go over until they could make inquiry about it, but this morning they sent me word that they were satisfied with it.

Mr. KING. I have no criticism myself; in fact, I know nothing about it. I was with committees all day yesterday and was not here when the bill was under consideration.

I have called the attention of the chairman of the committee to the item as I promised I would do, and, with the explanation which he makes, I can see no objection to it.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I have been out of the Senate during the luncheon hour and do not know just what has taken place, but when we reach the proviso at the end of line 6, on page 32 of the bill, I have a motion to make.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The committee amendments have been disposed of. The bill is as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. My understanding is that under the existing law the President of the United States appoints these employees, but the proviso takes that appointing power from the President and places it in the Librarian.

Mr. WARREN. I will explain it to the Senator. Originally the Library of Congress was in the Capitol Building, and the Librarian was a gentleman by the name of Spofford, who was a very able Librarian, but he was not specially qualified for executive business or the overlooking of mechanical matters. When the new Library Building was constructed it was built under the direction and control of a man by the name of Green, so far as the mechanical work was concerned. Having completed the construction of the building to his great credit, as it was thought, and being a man of humble means, it was arranged that he should be appointed to an office. The idea was merely to create a place so that that particular man might draw a salary. It was said, "We will create the office of superintendent of the building and appoint Mr. Green." This was done, with the expectation that when Mr. Green died that would end the matter and a successor would not be appointed.

Mr. Green has died and the position is considered to be unnecessary because we have to have both the Librarian and the Architect of the Capitol to superintend those various matters, so it has been undertaken, in place of the one appointed by the President, to create what we might term the position of a custodian in charge. But the mechanical part is all under the Architect of the Capitol, who is the architect in charge of that building and of the Capitol and the House and Senate Office Buildings. Those two employees in the first group are properly under the Librarian; they do library work and should be appointed by him, as all others are. Those in the second group, having charge of the steam heating, lighting, the electricity, and so forth, are appointed by the Architect of the Capitol, as all such others are.

So the Senator is right about it, that it takes away that one place from the President, because, while the President, I assume, has never thought of it since, it was at that time placed under the President in order that he might appoint the man Green of whom I have spoken, who was to have the position during his lifetime.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I knew the Librarian, Mr. Spofford, very well when I was a Member of the House and he was indeed a most competent Librarian, but my understanding is that he was a book man only and not a business man at all. I could readily understand why the change is made, as the Senator explains it, but we might again have a Librarian who would be a book man and nothing else. He might not combine the two, and a rare combination it is, too.

Mr. WARREN. Perhaps the Senator overlooks the fact that the Librarian by this arrangement has charge only of the strictly library matters. The other matters are under the Architect of the Capitol. All those matters which were at that time properly under the direction of Mr. Green have since been placed under the charge of the Architect of the Capitol.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Let me ask the Senator this question. For instance, under the proposed change in the law, who would appoint the disbursing officer?

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will look at the amendment and will read it, he will see, on page 32, starting in line 9, that the employees there mentioned are the only ones who are not directly under the Librarian.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. But coming back to the point of order, which I now formally make, I will ask the Senator if this is not general legislation and does it not change existing law?

Mr. WARREN. So far as the legislation is concerned, considered from the viewpoint of what the Senator has probably practiced under in the House, the Holman law, it merely reduces expenses and introduces no new expense and no new item; so that under the Holman law it would be hardly subject to a point of order. We have no such rule in the Senate. Our rule here is quite different. I think we could hardly call it general legislation, since it applies to one particular place only, and that in the way of a reduction.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I frankly admit that I am not familiar with the subject. It was brought to my attention this morning after 10 o'clock and I have had no time to examine it, but if the Senator is not very anxious to dispose of the bill to-day, I would be very glad if he would give me the opportunity to look into it and let us take it up later, if that be possible.

Mr. WARREN. Of course, the Senator understands how difficult it is to handle these appropriation matters. I think Senators ought to devote a little more time to looking up matters of that kind before they are picked up. I never bring bills directly before the Senate from the committee, but always report them, and always, or nearly always, announce when they will be taken up. I wish I could accommodate the Senator, but I hardly think he ought to ask that now. The bill was passed over last night at the request of other Senators.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Of course, I can only say that my information is that if the amendment is adopted it will disorganize and demoralize the service; that it will simply tear it up and create a spirit of discontent among the employees.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator wishes to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to and have it go to another vote, I shall not object to having it reconsidered and brought before the Senate.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I do not assume the chairman of a committee in making out his list of appropriations can expect Senators to examine each one closely, especially in the case of so experienced a Senator as the Senator in charge of this bill, but a new matter like the one to which I have directed attention might very easily escape the attention of Senators until some one furnished the information calling particular attention to it. Then, of course, he would inspect the bill and find the very radical change. It seems to me it is a very radical change to take the appointing power away from the President and give it to the Librarian, the Librarian himself being an appointee. It is the delegation of a delegated authority. It seems to me there could be no possible harm in allowing the President to continue to appoint instead of making this very radical change.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no further amendment proposed, the bill, as in Committee of the Whole, will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the amendments be engrossed and the bill be read a third time?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Would it be in order to move to amend this section by substituting the words "that said employee shall be appointed by the President of the United States"?

Mr. McKELLAR. Why would it not be better to strike out the proviso?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. That might be better. I will accept that suggestion. I move to strike out the proviso, thus leaving the law as it is now.

Mr. McKELLAR. I suppose it is subject to a point of order anyhow.

Mr. WARREN. I think the Senator does not mean that, because that would eliminate a number of clerks, and so forth, and I presume that the Senator does not wish to deprive them of being appointed by the Librarian.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I did not withdraw the point of order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state the inquiry.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the proviso in lines 6 and 7, page 32, constitute a committee amendment?

Mr. WARREN. That is being discussed now.

Mr. ROBINSON. Have the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole been concurred in in the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. They have been concurred in.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the amendment referred to was concurred in be reconsidered, in order that the matter may be determined upon its merits in the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment in lines 6 and 7 on page 32.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I hope the Senate will vote down the amendment. The appointing power is now in the President. There is no reason assigned why it should be taken away from the President and placed in the Librarian. I am informed that the amendment will work detriment to the service in the library, create dissatisfaction among the employees, and demoralize matters over there, bringing about a permanent state of discontent.

That being my information, coming from the very highest sources of the personnel of the Library employees, it seems to me the Senate ought not to be too hasty in taking away from the President an appointing power, which he has exercised to everybody's satisfaction, and giving it a new direction, which is nothing more than an experiment.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I should like to ask what was the ruling of the Chair on the point of order of the Senator from Georgia as to this amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair did not make any ruling. The point of order was not made in such a way that a ruling could be made on it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I did not understand the situation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There was a suggestion about the amendment not being in order, but the point of order was not specifically made.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think the amendment is clearly subject to a point of order, and I supposed that the Senator from Georgia had made the point of order, but I did not know as to that.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I asked for information as to the status of the bill when I first came into the Chamber from the lunch room, and I understood the reply to be that the amendment had not been acted on. If it has been acted on I suppose the proper course for me to pursue would be to ask unanimous consent that the vote by which it has been agreed to may be reconsidered.

Mr. WARREN. That has been done.

Mr. ROBINSON. That has already been done; so that the question which is now before the Senate is the amendment reported by the committee, which is subject to amendment. If the Senator desires to strike out the word "Librarian" and to insert the word "President," he may offer such an amendment.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Then that is what I will do. I move to strike out the word "Librarian" and to insert the word "President," just as I did some time ago, leaving the law as it is.

Mr. WARREN. I know the Senator from Georgia does not wish to do just what he has stated. The proviso reads:

Provided, That said employees shall be appointed by and be under the direction of the Librarian.

Certainly the Senator does not mean to strike out the word "Librarian" in the proviso and to insert the word "President," which would make the President practically the superintendent of such employees. There then would have to be an additional amendment to carry out the Senator's object. I presume that the Senator from Georgia does not expect to have the President appoint a little group of employees here comprising, perhaps, a dozen or 15 out of all of the Library employees.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, the Senator from Wyoming and I may not understand one another, but what I should like to do is to substitute the word "President" for the word "Librarian," so that this power will not be taken from the President and given to the Librarian.

Mr. WARREN. Then the Senator simply wishes to strike out the whole proviso and leave the matter in that way?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. The existing law is what I should like to see retained.

Mr. ROBINSON. That was my understanding, if the Senator from Georgia will permit me, when I asked unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which the Senate agreed to the amendment. The question now recurs on agreeing to the committee amendment. If the amendment is voted down, that will leave the superintendent to be appointed as he is now appointed. Is not that the case?

Mr. WARREN. If this proviso is stricken out it leaves the law standing as it now is, of course.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is not necessary to strike out the proviso. All that is necessary to do is to vote to reject the amendment. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment, as I understand. So, in order for the Senator from Georgia and those who agree with him to accomplish their purpose, they should vote against agreeing to the committee amendment. If it is not agreed to, then such appointments will be made as they are now made.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator refers to that particular portion of the bill, of course?

Mr. NORRIS. May I ask a question of the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to know—and it becomes important to know, I think, before we vote on the amendment—what the law is now in reference to the appointment of these employees? How are they selected? Are they under the civil service?

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the chairman of the committee state how that is?

Mr. WARREN. As I understand, what the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] desires is to leave the law as it is now as to the appointment of the superintendent? Am I right about that?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. That is true.

Mr. WARREN. Very well. In order to do that, it is only necessary to strike out the entire proviso and leave the remainder of the clause as it stands.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is my understanding; but the Senator from Wyoming constantly recurs to the statement, "to strike out the proviso." The proviso as yet is not in the bill. The question is on agreeing to the proviso. So those who take the view of the matter which the Senator from Georgia takes should vote against agreeing to the committee amendment. I ask the Senator from Wyoming if he will not agree, if he is authorized to do so, that this amendment may be rejected?

Mr. WARREN. As I have said several times, the Senate can vote not to agree to the proviso, and then nothing will be said in the bill as to appointment of the superintendent.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes. The question is upon agreeing to the Senate amendment; and the understanding is that the Senate amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I still have not obtained the information that I am trying to get from these wise men; and I ought to have it before I can vote intelligently. The proviso is to the effect that a number of employees—I do not know how many; 40 or 50, I think, probably—shall be appointed by the Librarian. If the proviso is not agreed to, then, so far as this bill is concerned, no law is made on the subject. Those employees are now in office and have been for a good many years, and somebody appoints them. I am trying to find out who it is. Does some Senator know, and will he tell me?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I can give the Senator the information from what I have learned about it. I am told that the President makes the appointment.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the President appoint these laborers and messengers?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Oh, no; the President appoints the employee who is mentioned previous to the proviso.

Mr. NORRIS. I have reference particularly to the employees who are covered by this proposed amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. All ordinary employees are appointed by the Librarian.

Mr. NORRIS. This proviso reads:

Provided, That said employees shall be appointed by and be under the direction of the Librarian.

The words "said employees," I presume, refer to all the employees mentioned in that paragraph, namely, the superintendent, 4 clerks, property clerk, messenger and assistant messenger, 3 telephone switchboard operators, captain of the watch, 2 lieutenants of the watch, 22 watchmen, foreman of laborers, 16 laborers, book cleaner, laundress, 2 attendants, and so forth. Does the Senator mean that the President appoints the laundress, for instance?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I think I can give the Senator that information in a word. The President will appoint the superintendent, "who shall act as disbursing officer, as now provided by law," and all of the subordinates are employed by him. The President does not have anything to do with them.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the information I am trying to get. Then the law provides that the superintendent shall appoint all of these employees?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. That is my understanding. The President appoints the superintendent, "who shall act as disbursing officer, as now provided by law," and the superintendent engages the subordinates.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the information I want.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, as the Senator from Nebraska has stated, many of these employees have been there for years, long before the civil service law applied, if indeed it applies at all now, to their particular branch. In fact, these employees are appointed in practically the same manner as Senators' clerks and others about the Capitol are appointed. That library is the Library of Congress in all that the title means. The meaning of the provision in regard to the employment of these men is that they shall be appointed, as in the case of other departments, from lists of eligibles furnished by the Civil Service Commission, provided the Librarian calls for eligibles from the Civil Service Commission's lists. The proviso simply changes the procedure as to a portion of the employees, so that they shall be under the control of the Librarian, as they are properly doing their work under the direction of the Librarian, and that the other employees shall be under the Architect of the Capitol, because of the mechanical nature of their work. The objection seems to be that we take from the President a duty not asked for by him, but which was given him in order to provide for one old-time employee who had done great service for the country but who has now passed away.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me get the facts. The Senator from Wyoming says that it is now proposed to take from the President the appointment of some official to fill a vacancy in an office formerly occupied by an old employee who is now dead. Who is that? Is that the Librarian?

Mr. WARREN. No; it is not the Librarian, but the man who has acted as the superintendent.

Mr. NORRIS. Does not the Senator know who he is?

Mr. WARREN. I do not know the man except as he comes before the committee, the same as others do.

Mr. NORRIS. I thought the Senator said he was dead.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Green, the first superintendent, is dead.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the man of whom I am speaking.

Mr. WARREN. He is the man for whom the office was created.

Mr. NORRIS. Who is going to fill the office?

Mr. WARREN. I think a man by the name of Averill is acting in that place.

Mr. NORRIS. Was it the object of the committee amendment in inserting this proviso that the place should be filled by appointment of the Librarian?

Mr. WARREN. There have been changes in the building in connection with the power that is used for the elevators, for heating, for lighting, and all of that sort of thing, so that the power is now furnished by the station which supplies the Capitol, which is under the superintendency of the Architect of the Capitol, who likewise has charge, of course, of the Capitol, the Senate and House Office Buildings, and other buildings that are dependent upon that station for power. It is proposed to place under the Architect of the Capitol the places which were formerly under Mr. Green, which had to do with the heating, the lighting, the elevators, and so forth, embracing mechanics, and a similar class of employees.

Mr. NORRIS. The effect of the proviso, being the committee amendment, then, would be to take these employees really out from under the civil service, would it not?

Mr. WARREN. Oh, no; not at all, if they chance to be there now.

Mr. NORRIS. Are they not there now?

Mr. WARREN. The Civil Service Commission appoints no one. Eligibles on the lists of the Civil Service Commission are not appointed by that commission. As the Senator knows better than I can tell him, the commission merely certifies the eligibles, and then appointments are made by the proper appointing authority.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand a list of eligibles is furnished by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. WARREN. As to this amendment, it is simply thought desirable that the control and direction of certain employees be transferred from the supervision of one officer to another; that is all.

Mr. NORRIS. I can not understand what the meaning of this proviso is if it does not go further than the Senator from Wyoming seems to think it does. It reads:

Provided, That said employees shall be appointed by and be under the direction of the Librarian.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator agrees that they should be under the direction of some one, does he not?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I presume so; and I suppose, of course, they are. He picks one out of the list.

Mr. WARREN. Yes; the Librarian picks one out of the list to serve under him.

Mr. NORRIS. How are these employees appointed now, let me ask the Senator?

Mr. WARREN. They are appointed in that way now, as to whom they shall serve under.

Mr. NORRIS. Then what is the use of the proviso?

Mr. WARREN. I have explained that, I thought sufficiently; as to these employees who have heretofore been under the control of one man we felt that some of them should be under the control of that one man, and some others should be under the control of another man.

Mr. NORRIS. Then the Senator's object is to put the employees mentioned in the paragraph under the control of the Librarian, although they have heretofore been under the control of the Architect of the Capitol?

Mr. WARREN. No; under the control of the superintendent.

Mr. NORRIS. Then I should think the language has been made entirely too broad to do that, because it covers the appointment as well.

Mr. WARREN. The next proviso places the other employees under the Architect of the Capitol.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I do not care to discuss this matter at great length if I correctly understand the position of the Senator from Wyoming. My understanding of his position is that he is not anxious to have the amendment agreed to, or is not insisting upon its being agreed to. I think this amendment ought to be rejected, for a number of reasons.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I do not want the Senator to misunderstand me.

Mr. ROBINSON. No; I do not want to misunderstand the Senator.

Mr. WARREN. I think this ought to be done; I think good management requires it; but it is one of the matters that are here for the Senate to decide, and I did not wish to cut any one off.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is a matter of legislation. It ought not to be in an appropriation bill under the rules of the Senate. It might have been subject to a point of order if the point of order had been properly made and pressed at the proper time; but, in any event, I do not believe the amendment ought to be agreed to. I am ready to take a vote on it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I move to amend the committee amendment by striking out in line 6, after the word "be," the balance of that line down to and including the word "be" in line 7, the part stricken out being "appointed by and be," so that if the amendment is agreed to it would leave the proviso reading as follows:

Provided, That said employees shall be under the direction of the Librarian.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think there is no objection to that amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. If that amendment is agreed to, it seems to me it does what the Senator from Wyoming says he wants to accomplish; that is, it leaves them under the control of the Librarian and leaves the appointment of them just as it is now, so that there can be no misunderstanding.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the amendment which was offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] is withdrawn. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WARREN. I ask to have the amendment to the amendment stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 32, lines 6 and 7, it is proposed to strike out the words "appointed by and be," so that, if amended, it will read:

Provided, That said employees shall be under the direction of the Librarian.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, that amendment is perfectly satisfactory and accomplishes the purpose I had in view, and I therefore hope that it may be voted upon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

AMENDMENT OF RAILROAD VALUATION ACT.

Mr. CUMMINS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 539, to further amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, before the motion is voted upon; I should like to make some inquiries of the Senator from Iowa. Can the Senator give me any idea as to how long it will take to dispose of this bill?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I can not give the Senator from Nebraska any information on that subject, because I do not know the attitude of other Senators with regard to it.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has not any idea about the debate that probably will take place?

Mr. CUMMINS. I know that it will require on my part a statement, with the interruptions that are likely to occur, that will take an hour or an hour and a half.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to say to the Senator that I am moved to ask the question because I have received from some one connected with the office of the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] an inquiry in regard to this particular bill. I talked with the Senator about it the other day; but, as I understand, this bill amends the railroad valuation act, of which the Senator from Wisconsin was the author, passed quite a number of years ago. The Senator from Wisconsin, as the Senator from Iowa knows, is detained at home on account of the death of his brother-in-law.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is true, Mr. President.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know from him directly that he wants to be here, nor do I know but that he is perfectly willing to have the bill proceeded with; but I wanted, if I could, to give him some information about the time when we shall perhaps reach a vote on the bill. If the Senator from Iowa can help me out in that, I shall be very much obliged to him.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is true that this bill seeks to amend the valuation act of 1913—

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, would not the Senator like to have more Senators present to hear him? It seems to me Senators ought to be given an opportunity of hearing the statement of the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I think so.

Mr. ROBINSON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brandegee	Harrell	Myers	Simmons
Bursum	Harris	New	Smith
Cameron	Harrison	Newberry	Spencer
Capper	Hedlin	Norris	Stanfield
Caraway	Jones, N. Mex.	Page	Swanson
Culberson	Jones, Wash.	Pepper	Trammell
Cummins	Kellogg	Phipps	Underwood
Dial	Kendrick	Polindexter	Walsh, Mass.
Edge	King	Pomerene	Walsh, Mont.
Fletcher	Lodge	Ransdell	Warren
Gerry	McKellar	Reed	Watson, Ga.
Glass	McNary	Robinson	Willis
Gooding	Moses	Sheppard

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to announce that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] are detained at a meeting of the Finance Committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 539, to further amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended.

Mr. KING. Before the vote is taken, I would like to ask the Senator from Iowa whether, in his view of the bill, it in any manner emasculates or weakens the act of which it is amendatory, and in which the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] was so much interested, if he was not the father of the act.

Mr. CUMMINS. From the standpoint of the railroad companies, I think it may be said that it would weaken the act. From the standpoint of those who are interested in securing lower railroad rates, I think it would strengthen the act.

Mr. KING. I make the inquiry because I have received a letter from a friend of the Senator from Wisconsin calling my attention to the fact that this bill is to be pressed for consideration to-day, and announcing the fact, as was stated by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], that the Senator from Wisconsin, owing to a death in his family, was compelled to be absent from the city, and further stating that he was profoundly interested in this bill. It occurred to me that in view of the fact that it seeks to amend an act which he had so much hand in framing, and which he considers of very great importance, if it does change or weaken that act from his standpoint, we should not take it up in his absence.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it strengthens the act from the standpoint of the Senator from Wisconsin. Allow me to answer in a connected way the inquiry propounded by the Senator from Nebraska.

I would be the last man in the Senate, I think all Senators know, to be guilty of any discourtesy toward the senior Senator from Wisconsin, and if I had not believed that he is second only to me in the desire to secure the passage of this bill, I would not have brought it forward at this time. I will state the facts in regard to it, and after I have stated them the Senate can judge for itself what its decision will be if there should be any application made for postponement.

I introduced this bill on the 21st of April, 1921, as I recollect. It was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, of which I am chairman. I referred the bill to a subcommittee composed of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], and myself.

The subcommittee held full and complete hearings on the bill. There appeared in favor of the measure the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Bureau of Valuation appointed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the representatives of all the State commissions. There appeared against the bill the representatives of the railroad companies. The matter was thoroughly discussed, and all the facts which I think are material to the inquiry were developed.

At the conclusion of that hearing the subcommittee, of which the Senator from Wisconsin was one, made a unanimous report in favor of the bill to the full committee. I prepared a written report for the subcommittee, in which the Senator from Wisconsin specifically joined. I have believed, therefore, and I think it may be taken for granted unless something appears to the contrary, that he is just as anxious to secure the passage of this bill as I am. I have had no communication with the Senator from Wisconsin for a month or more with regard to the bill, but he has never indicated to me in any way that he had changed his mind respecting it, and the Senator from Wisconsin is one who makes up his mind after full inquiry, and does not often change it.

That is the situation, and if there is any suggestion that the consideration of the bill should be postponed until he returns, I, of course, shall not resist it.

Mr. SMITH. Judging from the tone of the letter read by the Senator from Utah, I take it for granted it is identical with one I received, and I think the party writing it said in the letter that he had not communicated with the Senator from Wisconsin and did not know his position.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator refers to the letter of Mr. Manly—

Mr. SMITH. That is the letter.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is the letter which the Senator from Utah has shown me, and I can only say that Mr. Manly does not understand what the bill proposes.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I would like to say to the Senator from Iowa that I am perfectly satisfied with his explanation. I think Mr. Manly does not understand the situation, and that is the explanation of his letter.

Mr. KING. In view of the statement made by the Senator from Iowa, supplemented by the statement of the Senator from Nebraska, and with the limited knowledge which I have relative to the subject and to the matter before the Senate now, I would not feel like urging the Senate to postpone the consideration of the bill. If the Senator from Wisconsin joined in the report and if this bill is one which he desires to have passed, then I would not feel like asking for a postponement of the consideration of the bill for an indefinite time.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, if I may again recur to the letter of Mr. Manly, he is in error in regard to one thing. If this bill, or the amendment to the valuation act, proposed to relieve the Interstate Commerce Commission of the requirement to ascertain and report the original cost to-day of the lands used as rights of way and for other railroad purposes, then we all understand that the Senator from Wisconsin would be opposed to it, as I would be opposed to it; but this bill does not propose to relieve or withdraw from the Interstate Commerce Commission the requirement that it shall ascertain and report to the Congress the original cost of the lands which are now held and used for railway purposes.

Mr. FLETCHER. The only question in my mind would be whether the Senator from Wisconsin did not have the intention of offering some amendments to this bill, not so much that he objected to the bill, perhaps, but because he desired to have it amended.

Mr. CUMMINS. I can not answer on that point, of course. I do not know what may be in his mind with respect to amendments, but I know he offered no amendment in the committee.

Mr. KING. He joined in the report?

Mr. CUMMINS. He not only joined in the report, but he and I have taken such measures as we could from time to time to secure a report from the full committee. It was a little difficult to secure the attendance of enough members of the committee to give the subject full consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). The Senator from Iowa has moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 539) to further amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the paragraph entitled "First" of section 19a of the interstate commerce act, as amended, is amended by inserting after the words "In such investigation said commission shall ascertain and report in detail as to each piece of property" the words and commas following: ", other than land,"; so that said paragraph as amended shall read as follows:

"First. In such investigation said commission shall ascertain and report in detail as to each piece of property, other than land, owned or used by said common carrier for its purposes as a common carrier, the original cost to date, the cost of reproduction new, the cost of reproduction less depreciation, and an analysis of the methods by which these several costs are obtained, and the reason for their differences, if any. The commission shall in like manner ascertain and report separately other values, and elements of value, if any, of the property of such common carrier, and an analysis of the methods of valuation employed, and of the reasons for any differences between any such value and each of the foregoing cost values."

SEC. 2. That the paragraph entitled "Second" of said section 19a is amended by striking out the comma after the words "and the present value of the same," and inserting a period in place thereof, and by striking out the words "and separately the original and present cost of condemnation and damages or of purchase in excess of such original cost or present value" at the end of said paragraph, so that said paragraph as amended shall read as follows:

"Second. Such investigation and report shall state in detail and separately from improvements the original cost of all lands, rights of way, and terminals owned or used for the purpose of a common carrier, and ascertained as of the time of dedication to public use, and the present value of the same."

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I intend to proceed with some deliberation in presenting this subject to the Senate, because it is a subject of the first importance. It is, indeed, quite impossible to exaggerate, from my point of view, the importance of this measure to the country, interested, as it is, in the proper regulation of our railway system. I refer, in the first instance, to one or two well-settled doctrines or principles upon which the Interstate Commerce Commission must proceed, and which we must respect, inasmuch as these principles have been adopted and are well established by and through the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The first of these fundamental principles is that the railroad companies of the country are entitled, as against Government regulation, to a fair return upon the value of the railroad property which is used in rendering the service of transportation. The rates which are fixed from time to time by the Interstate Commerce Commission must be such rates as will yield a fair return upon the value of the property.

There is not much difference of opinion, among those who have thought on this subject and who are familiar with it, with regard to what constitutes a fair return. It may be changed from year to year, but there is not room for a great variety of judgment with regard to a fair return. The other element which determines the contribution which those who are interested in transportation must bear is the value of the property, and that is elemental; that lies at the foundation of all that we do with respect to the regulation of railway rates, and the ascertainment of the value of the property which renders the service, for which the public must pay, is the difficult task which we have assigned to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will it interrupt the Senator's argument if I ask him a question?

Mr. CUMMINS. Not at all. I invite inquiry rather than repel it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. On account of other public business I was not able to follow this bill in the committee and keep in touch with it. There is one question which I had in mind which I would like to have the Senator inform me about.

The valuation act, passed nearly 10 years ago, provided for the ascertainment of the valuation of the railroad lands on a certain existing basis. Subsequent to that the Congress passed the so-called Cummins bill, and one of the very important features of the Cummins bill is the adjustment of compensation to the railroads.

As the Senator will recall, under that bill the railroad is entitled to earn a certain percentage on its value, and above that the amount of compensation that it earns must be divided between the railroad and a general fund, which it is not necessary now to discuss. The basis of that ascertainment in the Cummins bill was the value. The Cummins bill provided that the commission should temporarily fix that value, but ultimately it should be the value ascertained under the valuation act.

Now, if we change the valuation act by fixing another basis of ascertaining the value, what effect will that have on the Cummins bill in so far as the rates there are based on the valuation that is in the pending bill? I may be entirely wrong about it, and that is one reason why I desired to hear the Senator discuss the bill, but I had some doubt in my mind about what will be the effect legally in the courts on the ascertainment of the Cummins bill if we change the basis of valuation on which the Cummins bill was originally written, as to whether it would not affect that piece of legislation entirely if it were pursued in the courts in a lawsuit. I am sure the Senator has considered it from that standpoint, and I should like to ask him what his reflected view is.

Mr. CUMMINS. I would prefer to answer that question a little later in my presentation of the matter. I think my answer will be more intelligible and certainly more easily understood if I pursue the plan that I have in mind. However, I answer it in a general way by saying that the Cummins transportation act, so called, provides that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall fix such rates as will yield to the railway companies, taken as a whole or in districts into which they may be divided by the commission, a fair return upon the value of the property held and used for the purposes of transportation.

The specific percentage which was fixed for two years now passes out of existence. It is not operative after the 1st of March of the present year. The act is not changed in any way. I am not seeking in the pending measure to take away the ascertainment of the present value of the railroad properties, using the exact language used in the transportation act. I do not propose to disturb that feature of the matter at all.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Let me ask the Senator a question at that point. That is right where I fear he may have done just that thing. I do not say that he has. Of course, I am not referring to the present rate fixed in the Cummins bill, because I know that that is to expire next month, and the commission will then fix what rate it can. What I referred to was the earning of the railroad that is to be taken away from it. After the earning amounts to so much, all in excess of that the railroad no longer has, and, of course, the basis of valuation fixes that amount, its earning, and the amount that is to be taken away. It is true that in the Cummins Transportation Act it was said that it should be based upon the value, but it is also true that it should be based upon the value ascertained in a particular way.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That was my impression of it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will consider that in a moment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It may be that we discussed so much in committee the question of how it was to be ascertained that I may have that confused in my mind with what is in the bill, but my understanding was that the bill provided that temporarily it should be fixed by the commission and subsequently the value should be ascertained under the valuation act the Senator is now attempting to amend.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think that is true; but I am not proposing to amend the valuation act to take away from the railroad property any part of its present or existing value. I think the Senator from Alabama will find as I go on such answer as I have, at least, to the question he has now propounded.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did not intend to interrupt the Senator and shall be glad to hear what he has to say.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am trying now to impress the Senate with the importance of the proposition that is contained in the bill before us, and that importance is readily seen if I assume for a moment that the tentative value, fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission in August or September, 1920, be accepted for a moment. The Interstate Commerce Commission fixed the value of the railroad property for the purpose of making rates at that time at the sum of $18,900,000,000. It is, I think, usually considered a fairly accurate estimate when I say that the lands of the railroad companies of the United States—I mean separating the lands from all superstructures and improvements on the lands that go to make up the completed railways—are regarded as constituting about 12½ per cent of the entire value of the railroad property. Twelve and a half per cent of $18,900,000,000 is substantially $2,000,000,000, so that in the estimate which the Interstate Commerce Commission has made of the railway property it can well be said that $2,000,000,000 of the estimate refers to the lands owned by the railroad companies and used for the purposes indicated.

If we increase the value of those lands $2,000,000,000, what is the result? We enforce upon the people of the country an annual contribution of $120,000,000. That is not to be paid once, but is to be paid each year as time goes on. If we increase the value of the land $4,000,000,000, we have then laid an additional burden upon the people of the country of $240,000,000 annually. I am assuming that 6 per cent would be regarded by most people as a fair return upon the value of the property.

I instance these two illustrations only to show how important it is that the commission reach a fair and just result in valuing the property of the railroad companies. Any increase reflecting itself so instantly and so completely in the rates upon the commodities of the country for transportation presents a subject that ought to command the immediate and undivided interest of everyone who desires to see railway regulation not only successful, but fair and reasonable.

I now turn to the statute in order that the amendment which I have proposed can be more fully understood. The statute was enacted in 1913, and, as we all know, commanded the Interstate Commerce Commission to enter upon an inquiry with regard to the value of railroad property. That duty was imposed upon the commission solely in order to enable it to prescribe just and reasonable rates for the service which the railroad companies render to the people. I shall take the liberty of reading two of the extracts from the law itself as it was enacted:

That the commission shall, as hereinafter provided, investigate, ascertain, and report the value of all the property owned or used by every common carrier subject to the provisions of this act. To enable the commission to make such investigation and report, it is authorized to employ such experts and other assistants as may be necessary. The commission may appoint examiners who shall have power to administer oaths, examine witnesses, and take testimony. The commission shall make an inventory which shall list the property of every common carrier subject to the provisions of this act in detail, and show the value thereof as hereinafter provided, and shall classify the physical property, as nearly as practicable, in conformity with the classification of expenditures for road and equipment, as prescribed by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

First, in such investigation said commission shall ascertain and report in detail as to each piece of property owned or used by said common carrier for its purposes as a common carrier, the original cost to date, the cost of reproduction new, the cost of reproduction less depreciation, and an analysis of the methods by which these several costs are obtained, and the reason for their differences, if any.

I pause there to suggest a principle which I shall endeavor to maintain and have endeavored to maintain during all this conflict with regard to the valuation of railroad property or any other public utility property. The cost of reproduction, less such depreciation as the use of the property may have brought about, is the standard substantially which the Supreme Court of the United States has adopted with reference to all personal property, and all structures or plants which depreciate with time and use. It is contended that the cost of reproduction should apply also to real property, which ordinarily does not depreciate and certainly does not depreciate with use. In my opinion, we must find some other standard to ascertain the value of real property in the hands of the railroad companies. I think in taking that position I have the support of the Supreme Court of the United States.

I proceed with the reading of paragraph (b):

The commission shall in like manner ascertain and report separately other values, and elements of value, if any, of the property of such common carrier, and an analysis of the methods of valuation employed, and of the reasons for any differences between any such value, and each of the foregoing cost values.

The amendment which I shall read in a moment makes just one change in the paragraph I have read. It eliminates from that paragraph the lands of the carriers.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question at that point?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. Is the paragraph which the Senator has just read, and which the bill proposes to modify, printed in the report of the committee?

Mr. CUMMINS. A part of it. It is proposed to be modified by putting in the words "other than lands," so that the first paragraph, being the one I have just read, would not include lands.

Mr. NORRIS. Where is that to be found in the report? What I would like to do is to get an idea of just what change is proposed to be made. In reading the report, where it states that certain words are to be stricken out, it is difficult to understand just what that means, unless one has the law before him.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator will look at the first page of the report after the small print, he will find it stated:

This bill proposes to insert in the first paragraph—

Which is not quoted; I have read it, however—the words "other than land."

I now come to the second paragraph of the existing law, which reads:

Second. Such investigation and report shall state in detail and separately from improvements the original cost of all lands, rights of way, and terminals owned or used for the purposes of a common carrier, and ascertained as of the time of dedication to public use, and the present value of the same.

That part of the second paragraph is not disturbed. The paragraph closes in this way—and separately the original and present cost of condemnation and damages or of purchase in excess of such original cost or present value.

That is the part of the second paragraph which the amendment eliminates. If those words are eliminated, the second paragraph will read in this way:

Second. Such investigation and report shall state in detail and separately from improvements the original cost of all lands, rights of way, and terminals owned or used for the purposes of a common carrier, and ascertained as of the time of dedication to public use, and the present value of the same.

If the proposed amendment is now clearly in the minds of Senators, I desire to point out some of the impossibilities in complying with the paragraph as it was originally enacted.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I dislike to interrupt the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am very glad to have the Senator ask questions. My only purpose in making the speech is to have the bill understood.

Mr. NORRIS. I regret that I have not quite understood the Senator's explanation. The last quotation which the Senator has read is as printed in the report, and, as I understand, is the way the law will read if amended?

Mr. CUMMINS. That is the way the second paragraph will read.

Mr. NORRIS. I refer to the second paragraph. Now, I wish the Senator would explain just what is the difference between that paragraph as it will read and as it now stands in the law.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am proceeding now to do that; but before doing so I wish to take up historically what has been done by the Interstate Commerce Commission under the act as it now stands. That is the interesting part of the history of valuation.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. In order to assist in making clear to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] the difference between the second paragraph as the committee proposes to amend it and the existing law, I will state that if the Senator will refer to the report, which I see he has in his hand, he will find that the present law contains, in addition to the language proposed by the committee, the following language:

And separately the original and present cost of condemnation and damages or of purchase in excess of such original cost or present value.

The committee amendment eliminates that language from the law. That is what the Senator from Nebraska wanted to know.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire the Senator from Nebraska and all others, however, to note that it does not eliminate the requirement that the commission shall find the present value of all land owned by the railway carriers.

When the commission began the work of valuation in 1913 and came to the question of the lands of the companies it was confronted immediately with a very uncertain task. I will not go over the debates which I have had repeated to me and which were repeated somewhat in the hearings which we had. It is sufficient to say that the commission yielded to a decision of the Supreme Court which practically held that railroad companies were entitled to have considered the present value of their real property no matter how they acquired it. Even if it were donated either by individuals or by the Government, still the railroad companies were entitled to revenues that would produce a return upon the present value of that property, no matter how acquired. So the commission finally decided that it would ascertain the value of the lands of the railway companies with reference to the values of adjacent lands or lots as the case might be; that is to say, if the adjacent property was a farm it would ascertain the value per acre of the farm at the time of valuation and then would take as the value of the right of way of the railroad company through that farm such proportion of the entire value as the area of the right of way bore to the area of the entire farm; so that if the adjacent land was worth $100 an acre and the railway company's right of way occupied 6 acres it attributed to that right of way a value of $600, and with like reasoning respecting lots and parts of lots. Tested by the rule which the commission adopted, all of the railway companies of the country receive the benefit of what we generally know as the unearned increment. Personally, I do not believe that a public utility company is entitled to the unearned increment, but I find myself in opposition to the Supreme Court of the United States, and I yield to the judgment of that high tribunal. The commission yielded also, as it was its duty to do, and gave to the railway companies everywhere the benefit accruing in the last 75 years from the advance in real property, including farms and town lots, an advance brought about by increasing population and increasing commerce.

It made a report to Congress in which it stated that it had adopted that view and set forth that it was utterly impossible for it to comply with that part of paragraph 2 of the law which required it to state "separately the original and present cost of condemnation and damages or of purchase in excess of such original cost or present value." I am only repeating the language of the commission, with which I heartily agree, when I say that it is beyond human power, it is almost an unthinkable thing to ask the Interstate Commerce Commission to report what it would cost to condemn the present right of way or purchase the present right of way of any railroad company in the United States. I simply ask Senators to think for a moment of a concrete illustration. Suppose that any Senator were asked to determine what it would cost to acquire, either by purchase or by condemnation, the right of way of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. from New York to Chicago. The very moment that is suggested it becomes apparent to anyone who is capable of thought that the commission could not in the very nature of things do it. There is but one such right of way, and the commission was asked to speculate and conjecture upon the amount that would be required either to condemn or purchase the right of way, terminals, and other real property in the possession of the railroad company which could not possibly be condemned; it was already in the use of the railroad company. The commission says, and says very truly, and the Supreme Court repeated that observation afterward, that it would be necessary to consider the situation as though the Pennsylvania Railroad were not there at all, and some one were entering upon the enterprise of acquiring such a right of way upon the assumption that there was no railroad there.

I do not believe that it is necessary for me to enlarge upon that phase of the matter, because the railroad companies themselves recognized the utter impossibility of ascertaining what it would cost to acquire any right of way, for how many of the owners of adjacent property would contribute the right of way for nothing in order to secure the enhancement of values that would result from building the railway, how many would contribute a part of the right of way, and so on, no human being can say. The whole subject is one that is so clear and plain that I ought not to consume a moment upon it. It is one of the things that can not be done, and the commission so declared in its report to Congress, and asked Congress to eliminate that requirement.

How did the railroad companies treat it? The railroad companies looked at it from this point of view: They said, in substance, of course the commission can not with any certainty determine what it would cost to acquire a right of way already in possession of a railroad company and that had no duplicate in the country, but we suggest this: Ordinarily it would cost three, four, or five times as much to secure the right of way as it would cost to purchase the adjoining property, to purchase a like area, or to purchase a farm of which the right of way was a part; and so in the Minnesota Rate case, to which I shall call your attention presently, they asked the Minnesota commission to multiply the present value of the property by three or four or five, and in that way ascertain the excess over present value as representing the cost of condemnation of the present right of way. The Supreme Court of the United States, in passing upon that question, commented—and I shall presently read from that—upon the impossibility of doing anything of that sort.

If the position of the railroad companies had been sustained, or is sustained now, and they are able to multiply the present value of the property as ascertained by the adjacent values, it will increase the valuation of the railroads by five or six or seven billions of dollars; and that means, upon the rate of return to which I have referred, an increase in the annual burden of anywhere from $240,000,000 to $248,000,000.

The Interstate Commerce Commission refused to make that report, for the reason that I have indicated; and having finished the valuation of several railroads, including the Kansas City & Southern Railway, without making a report as to excess of cost of condemnation over present value, that railroad applied for a writ of mandamus against the commission, seeking to require it to do this impossible thing.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. Because the commission should find what it would cost above the value of adjacent acre property to acquire a right of way or to condemn it, it does not necessarily mean that that value would be added to the value of the railroad, does it?

Mr. CUMMINS. I hope not.

Mr. KELLOGG. I understood the Senator to say that.

Mr. CUMMINS. But so far as Congress is concerned, it is our expression that it ought to be added to the value. I quite agree that if it is ever passed upon judicially, the court might exclude that element of value, and I very much hope it would.

Mr. KELLOGG. Is it strictly accurate to say that Congress would express an opinion that that ought to be added to the value of the property? All that the original valuation act provided was that all of the elements of original cost and present value, as nearly as Congress should determine the elements that should enter into it, should be found by the commission. The act does not require the commission to find the present value of the railroad; but they do it, and I think they should do it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think that is not quite accurate. The law does require the commission to find the present value of the railroads, and that would be true if this amendment were adopted.

Mr. KELLOGG. I mean it does not require the commission to find the added cost of acquiring the property. It requires or permits them to take into consideration all of the elements which the commission have found under this valuation law. The Supreme Court might determine that the present cost of acquiring the right of way over and above the value of adjacent property was not the proper basis of the present value of the property.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is no doubt about that. The court to which it may ultimately come, if it ever reaches a court, would not be required to accept the elements which have been prescribed by Congress for the consideration of the Interstate Commerce Commission; but when we have prescribed an element which I think every reasonable man must know is not a proper element to be considered in determining value, the sooner we withdraw that improper element from the consideration of the commission the better we shall stand in the forum of reason and justice.

Of course, I recognize that the Supreme Court of the United States, if the matter ever reaches that tribunal, can accept just such elements of value as it pleases at that time. We can not bind it; but the Interstate Commerce Commission is our agent. It is a legislative tribunal, organized by Congress for the information of Congress and for the information of the country and of the courts, if the work finally comes before the courts; and what I am objecting to is that we are insisting upon the Interstate Commerce Commission doing something that it can not possibly do, and that in attempting to do it a standard is being set up which everybody must recognize as false.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President—

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. When the Senator was interrupted by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], he had just reached a point that was exceedingly interesting, where he stated that the Interstate Commerce Commission having declined to do this impossible thing, a mandamus proceeding was commenced by the Kansas City & Southern Railway Co. I should like to have him finish that statement.

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes; I will do that; and I want it to be borne in mind now, as I proceed with the examination of this opinion and another opinion to which I shall refer, that the railroad took the position that the commission must adopt some multiplier; that is, that having ascertained the present value of the property in the way I have indicated, the commission then must multiply that value by two or three or four or five in order to ascertain what it would cost to acquire that right of way at the present time. The opinion of the Supreme Court in the mandamus case—and that is the one upon which the opponents of this legislation rely—

Mr. NORRIS. Is the Kansas City & Southern case the mandamus case to which the Senator had reference?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Where was that action commenced?

Mr. CUMMINS. It was begun in the District of Columbia. I will ask one of the pages to get me Two hundred and fifty-second United States Statutes.

The case is reported in Two hundred and fifty-second United States Statutes, at page 178; and the decision of the court below was reversed, that decision being favorable to the Interstate Commerce Commission. I quote from a printed copy of our report that part of the decision which I would read if the volume were here:

We are of opinion, however, that, considering the face of the statute and the reasoning of the commission, it results that the conclusion of the commission was erroneous, an error which was exclusively caused by a mistaken conception by the commission of its relation to the subject, resulting in an unconscious disregard on its part of the power of Congress and an unwitting assumption by the commission of authority which it did not possess. And the significance which the commission attributed to the ruling in the Minnesota Rate cases, even upon the assumption that its view of the ruling in those cases was not a mistaken one, but illustrates in a different form the disregard of the power of Congress which we have just pointed out, since, as Congress indisputably had the authority to impose upon the commission the duty in question, it is impossible to conceive how the Minnesota Rate ruling could furnish ground for refusing to carry out the commands of Congress, the cogency of which consideration is none the less manifest though it be borne in mind that the Minnesota Rate cases were decided after the passage of the act in question.

It is a peculiar thing, which will be interesting to lawyers—although I am not disparaging the court in any way—that in the opinion as it was originally filed that last sentence read, "Though it be borne in mind that the Minnesota rate cases were decided before the passage of the act in question." A subsequent review informed the Supreme Court that it was in error with regard to that fact, so that it made its reasoning suit the altered conditions, without any change whatsoever.

However that may be, the Supreme Court simply said that inasmuch as Congress had declared that the commission must do this thing, it was not for the commission to refuse, no matter how impossible it might be, to perform the duty, and no matter what the results might be. The Supreme Court did not pass upon the validity of the element of value in any sense whatsoever. It simply said to the commission, "You must obey the mandate of the legislative branch of the Government, of which you are a creature."

I am proposing now in this amendment to relieve the commission of this command, so that hereafter it will not be compelled to do this impossible thing or endeavor to do this impossible thing.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. There are a good many impossible things with regard to the railroads which would bring relief in the present situation if the commission could do them. Why not, following the Supreme Court, pass a law which would require the Interstate Commerce Commission to do a lot of impossible things, and let the Supreme Court compel them to do them, and afford relief from our present freight situation and passenger situation? If the Supreme Court can make them do impossible things, we have an instrumentality which we should make use of.

Mr. CUMMINS. It might be amusing for Congress to do that thing, but nothing would be accomplished. We can deal with the commission, I suppose, as we like, but when we attempt to affect the railroad properties we must confine ourselves within the limits of the Constitution. So the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska would probably not lead to any very valuable result.

I pursue this history now. After the decision of the Supreme Court which I have just read, the commission, as any other law-abiding tribunal would do, went forward in an attempt to comply with the law and with the order of the court, and entered upon another hearing. It necessarily adopted the general philosophy of the railroad companies as to the excess of cost over present value; and that is a most repugnant phrase to be found in any statute, Mr. President. It bears no other construction than that we were attempting to give to the railroad companies a return upon something more than the present value of their property, a thing which is abhorrent to every sense of justice.

The commission then proceeded, and I know it will be interesting to observe the policy which the commission was then compelled to adopt. Mark you, the railroad companies were all this time claiming that after the full value had been ascertained, the value with all the increases which development and growth had brought about, then the commission must multiply that value by three or four or more as a multiplier, and in that way fix the value of the lands.

The commission did not yield to the pressure brought to bear upon it by the railroad companies, and complied with the order of the Supreme Court in a mild degree. It divided the lands of the railroad companies into a great number of types. For instance, the first type noted on this paper furnished me by the valuation bureau of the commission is "highly developed lot property," and it has four subdivisions under that type—one commercial, one residential, one industrial, and one mixed utility when not included in above subdivisions. It reached the conclusion that where a whole lot had been taken by a railroad company of a commercial character it would add 60 per cent to the present value so ascertained. Where a part of a lot was taken under that designation it would add 75 per cent.

In residential property, where a whole lot was taken it would add 55 per cent, and where a part of a lot was taken it would add 70 per cent.

In industrial property where a whole lot was taken it would add 65 per cent, and where part only of a lot was taken it would add 70 per cent. I need not read more of this general type.

The second type was "Platted property in towns or outlying portions of large cities." Where a whole lot was taken under this type it added 60 per cent. Where a part of a lot only was taken it added 100 per cent.

I pass down to a more interesting type—that is, rural properties. With high-grade land adjoining land held in large tracts, if irrigated, indicated by symbol "I," it multiplied the present value by 1.6. That is, it doubled it and then added 60 per cent more. With adjoining land held in small tracts it added 1.7; that is, it doubled it and added 70 per cent more.

In medium-grade land adjoining land held in large tracts it added 1.6; with adjoining land held in small tracts it added 1.7.

Low-grade land adjoining land held in large tracts it added 1.9; with adjoining land held in small tracts it added 200 per cent.

I need not proceed further, although, Mr. President, having received this paper from the Valuation Bureau of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and in order that all who are interested in the subject may know just how it is being dealt with at the present time, I ask that this exhibit be printed as a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not criticizing the Interstate Commerce Commission. It is doing the best it can under the circumstances. It has practically compromised with the railroad claim by adopting about one-third of the railroad demands; but even with the additions which are proposed in this exhibit, and which the Interstate Commerce Commission is now pursuing as well as it is able, and if no part of the further railroad claim is conceded anywhere, we will add more than $2,000,000,000 to the value of the railway lands of the United States, and, as I remarked in the beginning—and that was the reason why I did so remark—that means an annual imposition upon the people in the way of railway rates of not less than $120,000,000; and if under the testimony which is being taken all the while by the Interstate Commerce Commission the railway claim should hereafter be given further consideration, it might add $4,000,000,000 or more to the value of these lands.

My position is that when the railway companies receive the benefit of the unearned increment of all the lands in the United States, of which they have been in possession in many instances for more than 50 years, when rights of way which were insignificant in their cost at the time of acquisition have quadrupled and multiplied in many instances a hundred times, I think they ought to be content, and should not insist that we should not only give them the benefit of the increased value of their property as a whole, but that we should attempt to ascertain what it would cost to acquire by condemnation or purchase their particular rights of way at the present moment. That is the whole purpose of this amendment. It is to strike out the requirement that the commission shall find the excess of cost of present condemnation over present value. They are entitled to present value, and I think the commission ought to be permitted to go its way unhampered by a statute of this sort, to ascertain, according to the rules of the law, as they understand those rules, what the present value of the lands held by the railway companies is.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. If I understand the Senator from Iowa correctly, the proper basis for a determination of a fair return on railroad property is the present value of that property?

Mr. CUMMINS. That is the rule which has been adopted many times by the Supreme Court.

Mr. ROBINSON. What relationship, if any, to the proper basis for rate fixing has the excess of the present cost of condemnation and damages for purchase over the original cost?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think it has any. I deny the principle of the cost of reproduction with regard to real property, because it can not be reproduced. There is no bit of real property in the world which can be reproduced.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then the provision which the committee bill seeks to strike out is an arbitrary element of value prescribed by the Congress and not such an element of value as a court would properly fix unless it were required by an act of Congress to be considered?

Mr. CUMMINS. That is my judgment. I do not believe the commission would give any consideration to this element if it were not commanded by Congress to do so. I do not believe that any commission should give any consideration to that element. If the commission in finding present values adopts a false formula, then, of course, it is for the courts of the country to correct it. All I want to say to the commission is that it shall find the present value of the property and find its original cost.

I do not agree with many of my fellow Senators with regard to the standards that ought to be applied. I hardly need mention my general view of the subject, because I am bound to confess that the trend of judicial decision in this respect is not in harmony with my opinion. I think that what the Constitution of the United States protects against unwise or unfair regulation on the part of our public tribunals is the investment in the property. If we enter upon this broad speculative field in ascertaining the value of the property used in public service we are apt to be led far astray. If originally we could have adopted in our legislation long, long ago the principle that it was the investment which men and women might make in public utilities that should not be impaired in a confiscatory way by legislation we would have been vastly better off than we are now. We must now yield to the doctrine laid down by many courts that it is the present value or existing value of the property, and we must, of course, proceed upon the hypothesis that the railway companies are entitled to the unearned increment upon the property.

I refer now to the case which seems to me to fortify my position at every point. The Minnesota Rate cases, reported in Two hundred and thirtieth United States, beginning at page 352, present probably the best considered analysis of the question that can be found anywhere in the decisions of that tribunal. The railroad companies attempted to do just this thing when the Minnesota State commission was engaged in valuing the railroad property in the State of Minnesota. The railroad companies insisted not only that they should use this multiplier of three, three and a half, or four, but that the present value or what might be called the original value should be ascertained with reference not to the value of the adjacent property, but with reference to the special use which the railroads were making of their property.

Mr. Justice Hughes rendered the opinion in the case, and for clearness in its argument and for justice in its conclusions I think no opinion in all the reports of the Supreme Court is more noted than this one. It is very long, and I must necessarily extract just a few paragraphs. I am about to begin reading on page 450. The court pointed out what would be the result of certain rules claimed by the railroad companies and then said:

These are the results of the endeavor to apply the cost-of-reproduction method in determining the value of right of way.

That is the fundamental proposition which lies at the bottom of the amendment which I have proposed.

It is at once apparent that so far as an estimate rests upon a supposed compulsory feature of the acquisition—

That is, condemnation— it can not be sustained. It is said that the company would be compelled to pay more than what is the normal market value of property in transactions between private parties; that it would lack the freedom they enjoy, and, in view of its needs, it would have to give a higher price. It is also said that this price would be in excess of the present market value of contiguous or similarly situated property. It might well be asked, who shall describe the conditions that would exist, or the exigencies of the hypothetical owners of the property, on the assumption that the railroad were removed? But, aside from this, it is impossible to assume, in making a judicial finding of what it would cost to acquire the property, that the company would be compelled to pay more than its fair market value. It is equipped with the governmental power of eminent domain. In view of its public purpose it has been granted this privilege in order to prevent advantage being taken of its necessities. It would be free to stand upon its legal rights and it can not be supposed that they would be disregarded.

It is urged that, in this view, the company would be bound to pay the "railway value" of the property. But supposing the railroad to be obliterated and the lands to be held by others, the owner of each parcel would be entitled to receive on its condemnation its fair market value for all its available uses and purposes.

Then the opinion proceeds to consider a somewhat separate phase of the matter and finally this paragraph is found:

Moreover, it is manifest that an attempt to estimate what would be the actual cost of acquiring the right of way if the railroad were not there, is to indulge in mere speculation.

And yet that is exactly what the law requires the Interstate Commerce Commission to do, nothing more, nothing less, and that is not my interpretation; but it is the interpretation which the commission itself has put upon this part of the statute. The opinion then proceeds:

The railroad has long been established; to it has been linked the activities of agriculture, industry, and trade. Communities have long been dependent upon its service, and their growth and development have been conditioned upon the facilities it has provided. The uses of property in the communities which it serves are to a large degree determined by it. The values of property along its line largely depend upon its existence. It is an integral part of the communal life. The assumption of its nonexistence, and at the same time that the values that rest upon it remain unchanged, is impossible and can not be entertained. The conditions of ownership of the property and the amounts which would have to be paid in acquiring the right of way, supposing the railroad to be removed, are wholly beyond reach of any process of rational determination. The cost of reproduction method is of service in ascertaining the present value of the plant when it is reasonably applied and when the cost of reproducing the property may be ascertained with a proper degree of certainty.

That is true of a freight car; it is true of an engine; it is true of a bridge; it is true of any superstructure. We can ascertain with reasonable certainty the cost of reproducing any one of these instrumentalities of a railroad, but we can not ascertain with any certainty the cost of reproducing the right of way.

I continue reading:

But it does not justify the acceptance of results which depend upon mere conjecture. It is fundamental that the judicial power to declare legislative action invalid upon constitutional grounds is to be exercised only in clear cases. The constitutional invalidity must be manifest and if it rests upon disputed questions of fact, the invalidating facts must be proved. And this is true of asserted value as of other facts.

Mr. President, I do not intend to continue the discussion further at this time. The whole subject is so clear, the injustice of requiring the commission to do this thing is so manifest, and the utter want of any showing that injustice would be done to the railroads by eliminating this part of the statute is so conclusively established that I am at a loss to know what further I can say in support of the amendment which I have proposed.

I do not want Congress to stand longer in the attitude of suggesting to the commission or suggesting to any court that this excess of cost is a fair and reasonable element in the value of railway property. I want to relieve the commission of an embarrassment which it creates, and permit the commission to go forward and value the railway property, ascertain the present value of railway lands unhindered and unhampered by any expression on the part of Congress with regard to the elements which enter into that value. If I thought I could get it adopted I would be very glad to bring forward a rule which, in my judgment, the Interstate Commerce Commission should follow in ascertaining the value of lands, but I am not going to do it simply because I think the commission will reach conclusions, if it is allowed to proceed without this impossible command, that will fairly meet the views of all the people in the country and will give us for a basis for rate making in the future a reasonable value, a value which being established will not oppress the people to whom the railroads must render their service.

APPENDIX.

COST OF ACQUISITION. FINAL TYPES.

I. HIGHLY DEVELOPED LOT PROPERTY.

(a) Commercial:

1. Whole lots taken, $0.60.
2. Part only of lots taken, $0.75.

(b) Residential:

1. Whole lots taken, $0.55.
2. Part only of lots taken, $0.70.

(c) Industrial:

1. Whole lots taken, $0.65.
2. Part only of lots taken, $0.70.

(d) Mixed utility when not included in the above subdivision:

1. Whole lots taken, $0.55.
2. Part only of lots taken, $0.65.

II. PLATTED PROPERTY IN TOWNS OR OUTLYING PORTIONS OF LARGE CITIES.

1. Whole lots taken, $0.60.
2. Part only of lots taken, $1.

III. IRREGULAR TRACTS—SUBURBAN.

(a) Residential:

1. Whole tracts taken, $0.70.
2. Part only of tracts taken, $1.

(b) Industrial:

1. Whole tracts taken, $0.65.
2. Part only of tracts taken, $0.70.

(c) Truck gardens, undeveloped or property not falling in either residential or industrial:

1. Whole tracts taken, $0.80.
2. Part only of tracts taken, $1.

IV. RURAL.

A. Right-of-way strip only taken:

(a) High-grade land—

1. Adjoining land held in large tracts (if irrigated, indicate by symbol "I"), $1.60.
2. Adjoining land held in small tracts (if irrigated, indicate by symbol "I"), $1.70.

(b) Medium-grade land—

1. Adjoining land held in large tracts, $1.60.
2. Adjoining land held in small tracts, $1.70.

(c) Low-grade land—Swamp, rocky, desert, and grazing—

1. Adjoining land held in large tracts, $1.90.
2. Adjoining land held in small tracts, $2.

Value of orchards, minerals, and timber deducted and land then valued.

(d) Orchard lands—

1. Adjoining land held in large tracts.
2. Adjoining land held in small tracts.

(e) Mineral lands—

1. Fissure veins or pockets.
2. Sedimentary beds.

(f) Timberlands—

1. Adjoining land held in large tracts.
2. Adjoining land held in small tracts.

B. Large areas taken by carrier:

- (a) High-grade land—
 1. Adjoining land held in large tracts (if irrigated, indicate by symbol "i"), $0.60.
 2. Adjoining land held in small tracts (if irrigated, indicate by symbol "i"), $0.70.
- (b) Medium-grade land—
 1. Adjoining land held in large tracts, $0.70.
 2. Adjoining land held in small tracts, $0.80.
- (c) Low-grade land—Swamp, rocky, desert, and grazing—
 1. Adjoining land held in large tracts, $0.80.
 2. Adjoining land held in small tracts, $1.

Value of orchards, minerals, and timber deducted and land then valued.

- (d) Orchard lands—
 1. Adjoining lands held in large tracts.
 2. Adjoining lands held in small tracts.
- (e) Mineral lands—
 1. Fissure veins or pockets.
 2. Sedimentary beds.
- (f) Timberlands—
 1. Adjoining lands held in large tracts.
 2. Adjoining lands held in small tracts.

V. WATER-FRONT LANDS.

1. Right of way, $1.
 2. Docks and wharves, $0.40.

VI.

A. Owned right of way for industrial track, where the adjoining land is owned by the industry served.
 B. Where the right of way is through large tracts of noncarrier land owned by the carrier.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I understand that no Senator desires at this moment to continue the discussion on the pending bill, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. LODGE. There is no need for the Senator making that request. The motion which I am about to make will not displace his bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think that is true, and therefore I withdraw the request for unanimous consent.

TREATY WITH JAPAN CONCERNING YAP.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the treaty with Japan concerning the island of Yap in open executive session.

Mr. ROBINSON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to have the motion adopted, and then the point of no quorum may be made.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, proceeded to consider the treaty with Japan concerning the island of Yap.

Mr. LODGE. Now, Mr. President, I make the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Harrison	McNary	Robinson
Borah	Hefflin	Moses	Sheppard
Bursum	Jones, N. Mex.	Nelson	Simmons
Cameron	Jones, Wash.	New	Smith
Capper	Kellogg	Norris	Trammell
Caraway	Kendrick	Overman	Underwood
Cummins	King	Phipps	Wadsworth
Dial	Ladd	Pittman	Warren
Gerry	Lodge	Polindexter	Watson, Ga.
Harris	McKinley	Pomerene	Willis

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is not present. The Secretary will call the names of the absent Senators.

The reading clerk called the names of the absent Senators, and the following Senators answered to their names when called:

------	------------	----------	--------------

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to state that the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] is necessarily absent on business of the Senate. I also wish to announce that the following Senators are detained from the Senate in attendance upon the Committee on Finance:

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND], and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN].

The following Senators entered the Chamber and answered to their names:

Colt	Harrell	Spencer	Stanfield
Ernst	Johnson

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, it had been my intention to take up to-night the treaty with Japan concerning the island of Yap, but the hour is so late that I shall only ask now that the treaty be read. I give notice that to-morrow, immediately after the conclusion of the reading of the Farewell Address, I shall move to continue, in open executive session, the consideration of the treaty, and I shall not attempt to address the Senate now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator desire to have the preamble read, or just the articles?

Mr. LODGE. The preamble is very important. I wish to have that read also.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The treaty will be read.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND JAPAN.

Considering that by article 119 of the treaty of Versailles, signed on June 28, 1919, Germany renounced in favor of the powers described in that treaty as the principal allied and associated powers, to wit, the United States of America, the British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan, all her rights and titles over her overseas possessions;

Considering that the benefits accruing to the United States under the aforesaid article 119 of the treaty of Versailles were confirmed by the treaty between the United States and Germany, signed on August 25, 1921, to restore friendly relations between the two nations;

Considering that the said four powers—to wit, the British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan—have agreed to confer upon His Majesty the Emperor of Japan a mandate, pursuant to the treaty of Versailles, to administer the groups of the former German islands in the Pacific Ocean lying north of the Equator, in accordance with the following provisions:

"ARTICLE 1. The islands over which a mandate is conferred upon His Majesty the Emperor of Japan (hereinafter called the mandatory) comprise all the former German islands situated in the Pacific Ocean and lying north of the Equator.

"ART. 2. The mandatory shall have full power of administration and legislation over the territory subject to the present mandate as an integral portion of the Empire of Japan, and may apply the laws of the Empire of Japan to the territory, subject to such local modifications as circumstances may require. The mandatory shall promote to the utmost the material and moral well-being and the social progress of the inhabitants of the territory subject to the present mandate.

"ART. 3. The mandatory shall see that the slave trade is prohibited and that no forced labor is permitted, except for essential public works and services, and then only for adequate remuneration. The mandatory shall also see that the traffic in arms and ammunition is controlled in accordance with principles analogous to those laid down in the convention relating to the control of the arms traffic signed on September 10, 1919, or in any convention amending same. The supply of intoxicating spirits and beverages to the natives shall be prohibited.

"ART. 4. The military training of the natives, otherwise than for purposes of internal police and the local defense of the territory, shall be prohibited. Furthermore, no military or naval bases shall be established or fortifications erected in the territory.

"ART. 5. Subject to the provisions of any local law for the maintenance of public order and public morals, the mandatory shall insure in the territory freedom of conscience and the free exercise of all forms of worship, and shall allow all missionaries, nationals of any state member of the League of Nations, to enter into, travel, and reside in the territory for the purpose of prosecuting their calling.

"ART. 6. The mandatory shall make to the council of the League of Nations an annual report to the satisfaction of the council, containing full information with regard to the territory and indicating the measures taken to carry out the obligations assumed under articles 2, 3, 4, and 5.

"ART. 7. The consent of the council of the League of Nations is required for any modification of the terms of the present mandate. The mandatory agrees that, if any dispute whatever should arise between the mandatory and another member of the League of Nations relating to the interpretation or the application of the provisions of the mandate, such dispute, if it can not be settled by negotiation, shall be submitted to the permanent court of international justice provided for by article 14 of the covenant of the League of Nations";

Considering that the United States did not ratify the treaty of Versailles and did not participate in the agreement respecting the aforesaid mandate;

Desiring to reach a definite understanding with regard to the rights of the two Governments and their respective nationals in the aforesaid islands, and in particular the island of Yap, have resolved to conclude a convention for that purpose, and to that end have named as their plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States of America: Charles Evans Hughes, Secretary of State of the United States; and

His Majesty the Emperor of Japan: Baron Kijuro Shidehara, His Majesty's ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary at Washington;

Who, after having communicated to each other their respective full powers, found to be in good and due form, have agreed as follows:

ARTICLE I.

Subject to the provisions of the present convention, the United States consents to the administration by Japan, pursuant to the aforesaid mandate, of all the former German islands in the Pacific Ocean lying north of the Equator.

ARTICLE II.

The United States and its nationals shall receive all the benefits of the engagements of Japan defined in articles 3, 4, and 5 of the aforesaid mandate, notwithstanding the fact that the United States is not a member of the League of Nations.

It is further agreed between the high contracting parties as follows:

(1) Japan shall insure in the islands complete freedom of conscience and the free exercise of all forms of worship which are consonant with public order and morality; American missionaries of all such religions shall be free to enter the islands and to travel and reside thereon, to acquire and possess property, to erect religious buildings and to open schools throughout the islands; it being understood, however, that Japan shall have the right to exercise such control as may be necessary for the maintenance of public order and good government and to take all measures required for such control.

(2) Vested American property rights in the mandated islands shall be respected and in no way impaired;

(3) Existing treaties between the United States and Japan shall be applicable to the mandated islands;

(4) Japan will address to the United States a duplicate of the annual report on the administration of the mandate to be made by Japan to the council of the League of Nations;

(5) Nothing contained in the present convention shall be affected by any modification which may be made in the terms of the mandate as recited in the convention unless such modification shall have been expressly assented to by the United States.

ARTICLE III.

The United States and its nationals shall have free access to the island of Yap on a footing of entire equality with Japan or any other nation and their respective nationals in all that relates to the landing and operation of the existing Yap-Guam cable or of any cable which may hereafter be laid or operated by the United States or by its nationals connecting with the island of Yap.

The rights and privileges embraced by the preceding paragraph shall also be accorded to the Government of the United States and its nationals with respect to radiotelegraphic communication; provided, however, that so long as the Government of Japan shall maintain on the island of Yap an adequate radiotelegraphic station, cooperating effectively with the cables and with other radio stations on ships or on shore, without discriminatory exactions or preferences, the exercise of the right to establish radiotelegraphic stations on the island by the United States or its nationals shall be suspended.

ARTICLE IV.

In connection with the rights embraced by Article III, specific rights, privileges, and exemptions, in so far as they relate to electrical communications, shall be enjoyed in the island of Yap by the United States and its nationals in terms as follows:

(1) Nationals of the United States shall have the unrestricted right to reside in the island, and the United States and its nationals shall have the right to acquire and hold on a footing of entire equality with Japan or any other nation or their respective nationals all kinds of property and interests, both personal and real, including lands, buildings, residences, offices, works, and appurtenances.

(2) Nationals of the United States shall not be obliged to obtain any permit or license in order to be entitled to land and operate cables on the island or to establish radiotelegraphic service, subject to the provisions of Article III, or to enjoy any of the rights and privileges embraced by this article and by Article III.

(3) No censorship or supervision shall be exercised over cable or radio messages or operations.

(4) Nationals of the United States shall have complete freedom of entry and exit in the island for their persons and property.

(5) No taxes, port, harbor, or landing charges or exactions of any nature whatsoever, shall be levied either with respect to the operation of cables or radio stations, or with respect to property, persons, or vessels.

(6) No discriminatory police regulations shall be enforced.

(7) The Government of Japan will exercise its power of expropriation in the island to secure to the United States or its nationals needed property and facilities for the purpose of electrical communications if such property or facilities can not otherwise be obtained.

It is understood that the location and the area of land so to be expropriated shall be arranged between the two Governments according to the requirements of each case. Property of the United States or of its nationals and facilities for the purpose of electrical communication in the island shall not be subject to expropriation.

ARTICLE V.

The present convention shall be ratified by the high contracting parties in accordance with their respective Constitutions. The ratifications of this convention shall be exchanged in Washington as soon as practicable, and it shall take effect on the date of the exchange of the ratifications.

In witness whereof, the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this convention and have hereunto affixed their seals.

Done in duplicate at the city of Washington this 11th day of February, 1922.

CHARLES EVANS HUGHES.
K. SHIDEHARA.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Committee on Foreign Relations have reported a resolution which the Secretary will read.

The Assistant Secretary read the resolution reported yesterday by Mr. LODGE from the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of Executive R. Sixty-seventh Congress, second session, a treaty between the United States and Japan with regard to the rights of the two Governments and their respective nationals in the former German islands in the Pacific Ocean, lying north of the Equator, in particular the island of Yap, signed at Washington on February 11, 1922.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President—

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Colorado before making a motion to go into executive session with closed doors.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate resumes its legislative session.

DEATH OF HON. JOHN F. SHAFROTH.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, it is with a feeling of deep regret that I announce to the Senate the passing away of former Senator John F. Shafroth, of Colorado. After an illness of only a few days, the end came last evening at his home in Denver, Colo.

Mr. Shafroth was born in Fayette, Mo., in June, 1854, and he was therefore in his sixty-eighth year. His service in the House of Representatives comprised four terms, and later he was for four years governor of his State. Mr. Shafroth was elected to the United States Senate to represent Colorado, taking office on March 4, 1913, and serving his full term of six years, which included the entire period of the Great War. His three sons were in the Army or Navy during that war, and they, together with the widow, are the only survivors.

While the Senator and I were members of opposing political parties, that difference in faith was never permitted to interfere with our personal friendship, and I am happy to say that his attitude toward me personally was invariably one of courteous consideration. Our two families were always upon terms of cordial friendship, a friendship which has extended over a great number of years.

Those who served with Senator Shafroth during his membership in this body are well aware of his courteous manner, his high standards, and his kindly bearing, and I know they are deeply grieved over his loss.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me just a word?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I was greatly grieved when I read in the paper this morning of the passing of an old-time friend and a colleague with whom I had served the larger part of a quarter of a century.

When I first knew John F. Shafroth we served together on one of the committees of the House when Mr. Reed was Speaker. He then sat at the Republican end of the table and I at the Democratic end. Afterwards he came to our side of the political family. I have known him long and I have known him well.

He was a man who was always moved by the higher impulses, who never responded to personal desires.

His political life was as clean as the life of a good woman. He was a man without guile. He wore his heart on the outer sleeve. Everybody knew where John Shafroth stood on all questions and everybody knew the impulses that guided his life.

I felt, as one of his colleagues on this side of the Chamber, that I could not let this occasion go by without saying how deeply we all regret his loss, and feel that a good and a great man has gone beyond the shore.

EXECUTIVE SESSION WITH CLOSED DOORS.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business with closed doors.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 57 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 22, 1922, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 21, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, may this silent moment, like a touch of God, sink into our breasts and send us forth through the waiting hours to labor in sympathy with men, their duties and their needs. Clear away all misconception and enrich us with knowledge and wise utterance. Teach us how to bear this life, not proudly, but humbly, and how to rise above temptation and pursue the right ways. O let the light of Thy face shine upon the children of misfortune and deliver them from despondency and distrust, and when the eventide comes be with us on that path that slopes to rest. Through Christ our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEASING A TRACT OF LAND TO CITY OF LEAVENWORTH.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 9060 and concur in the amendment of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table and concur in the Senate amendment a bill which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9060) to authorize the Secretary of War to lease a certain tract of land to the city of Leavenworth, in the State of Kansas.

The Senate amendment was read.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendment.

Mr. GARNER. May I ask the gentleman what committee this bill originally came from?

Mr. ANTHONY. From the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GARNER. Do the minority members of the Committee on Military Affairs know that he is going to take this up, or is it satisfactory to them?

Mr. ANTHONY. I never heard of any objection to the bill. It simply authorizes the Secretary of War to transfer to the city a lease, which now is possessed by a corporation, for a water reservoir.

Mr. GARNER. I want to suggest to the gentleman from Kansas and other gentlemen who have charge of bills that come from conference or otherwise, that it is a very good practice in the House, and one that will result not only in desirable legislation but better practice generally, to notify the minority members, or that a statement be made that they have been seen in regard to the matter.

Mr. ANTHONY. I agree with the gentleman. If the bill had been of any importance, I would certainly have done that.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

HOUSING FOR WAR NEEDS.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas submits from the Committee on Rules a privileged resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 290.

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering H. R. 9597, being a bill "To amend an act entitled 'An act to authorize the President to provide housing for war needs,' approved May 16, 1918." There shall be not to exceed one hour of general debate on the said bill, the time for such general debate to be controlled one-half by those favoring the bill and one-half by those opposing it. Thereupon the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. Upon the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment the bill shall be reported to the House with such amendments as may have been agreed to; whereupon the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and on all amendments thereto to final passage, without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, this resolution makes it in order that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill in question. I understand the bill was unanimously reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. The only question raised in the Committee on Rules as to whether or not it should be considered was raised by myself; otherwise, it was unanimously reported.

Mr. GARNER. Do I understand that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] was at the meeting that reported this resolution?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes. It was entirely satisfactory to every member of the committee except myself. I did not think that the resolution was necessary. It is my contention that with the law as it now exists everything necessary to be done could have been done and probably would have been done if it had not been the desire of certain gentlemen to hold very desirable positions for another year.

Mr. LANHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will.

Mr. LANHAM. What objection is there to a division of the time in the usual way? I anticipate that gentlemen on that side and on this side would be willing to yield half of the time to those opposed to the bill should they desire time.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I understand the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ELLIOTT] will ask to control the time in support of the bill, and anybody opposing the bill may take the time in opposition to it. I am informed that no member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds is opposed to the bill.

Mr. LANHAM. If some gentleman on that side should get recognition in opposition to the bill, the time would be controlled exclusively on that side.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I think usually an arrangement is made so that the center aisle divides on matters of that kind.

Mr. LANHAM. Would the gentleman be adverse to a division of the time equally between members of the committee on the two sides?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The objection to putting that in the rule was that nobody on the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds was opposed to the bill.

Mr. LANHAM. Would the gentleman object to unanimous consent to that effect, that those in charge of the time on the respective sides should agree that half of the time would be yielded to the opposition?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That will be agreed to by unanimous consent pending the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KING. Does the gentleman recommend that this rule be voted down simply as a matter of conscience?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No. But if any Member has a sensitive conscience he has a right to do that.

Mr. WALSH. Does the rule provide that general debate shall be confined to the bill?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It does not. It is only 30 minutes on a side.

Mr. WALSH. That is general debate. You can talk about—

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. You can talk about anything.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman object to unanimous consent that it be in order to yield time on the rule?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The time on the rule is just about to expire.

Mr. WINGO. Just what changes does the bill make in the law?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It authorizes them to pay certain taxes and close up certain contracts.

Mr. WINGO. Have they not authority under the law now to do that?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I think they have; yes. But they say not, and they will not act until they get this authority, all of which has resulted in prolonging the life of the Housing Corporation for at least a year.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman does not think, for the reasons given, that the bill or the rule ought to be adopted?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I think so. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 9597; and, pending that, I ask unanimous consent that if there are no opponents to this bill, the time for general debate be divided equally between this side of the House and the other side, and that I shall have control of one half of the time and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] shall have control of the other half.

Mr. WINGO. I am against the bill. I do not know who else is. I agree with the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] that there is no necessity for this bill.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Does the gentleman want time?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. LANHAM. I will agree to give the gentleman such time as he wishes, if the unanimous-consent request is agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the time for general debate be divided equally, one half to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 9597.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] will please take the chair.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9597) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the President to provide housing for war needs," approved May 16, 1918, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 9597, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9597) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the President to provide housing for war needs," approved May 16, 1918.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5 of an act entitled "An act to authorize the President to provide housing for war needs," approved May 16, 1918, as amended by an act approved July 19, 1919, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"Sec. 5. That the power and authority granted herein shall cease with the termination of the present war as formally proclaimed by the President, except the power and authority to care for, rent, operate, and sell such property as remains undisposed of; to conclude, execute, settle, and adjust all contracts or other obligations made or incurred during the war, or in carrying out the provisions of this act, including contracts made with municipalities for the furnishing of services and facilities to the property of such corporations, and for the construction of public utilities by such municipalities in pursuance to the terms of said contract; to collect the principal and interest of loans made or other sums due under obligations entered into under this act; and to take such other steps as are necessary to protect the interests of the Government and to fulfill the obligations duly incurred in carrying out the powers granted by said act. All property shall be sold at its fair market value as soon as can be advantageously done, and a reasonable effort shall be made to sell the houses direct to prospective individual home owners for their own occupancy before they are offered for sale in bulk or to speculative investors. Full power and authority is hereby given to sell and convey all of such property remaining undisposed of after the termination of the present war. All deeds, contracts, or other instruments of conveyance executed by the United States Housing Corporation by its duly authorized officer or officers where the legal title to the property in question is in the name of the said corporation, and by the United States of America by the Secretary of Labor where the title to the property in question is in the name of the United States of America, shall be conclusive evidence of the transfer of title to the property in question according to the purport of such deeds, contracts, or other instruments of conveyance, and in no case shall any purchaser or grantee thereunder be required to see to the application of any purchase money: Provided, That no sale or conveyance shall be made hereunder on credit without reserving a first lien on such property for the unpaid purchase money: Provided further, That in no case shall any such property be given away; nor shall rents be furnished free, but the rental charges shall be reasonable and just as between the tenants and the Government. The United States Housing Corporation (a corporation organized by authority of the President of the United States, pursuant to the provisions of an act approved May 16, 1918, entitled 'An act to authorize the President to provide housing for war needs,' and an act approved June 4, 1918, entitled 'An act making appropriations to supply additional urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes') shall wind up its affairs and dissolve as soon as it has disposed of said property and performed the duties and obligations herein set forth: And provided further, That the corporation shall report to Congress on December 31, 1919, and on June 30, 1920, all sales made and the amounts received therefrom, together with a detailed statement of receipts and expenditures on account of the other activities authorized by law.

With committee amendments, as follows:

On page 2, line 5, after the word "contracts," insert the words "or other obligations."

On page 2, line 5, after the word "made," insert the words "or incurred."

On page 2, line 6, after the word "municipalities," insert the words "or other political subdivisions."

On page 2, line 9, after the word "municipalities," insert the words "or other political subdivisions."

On page 2, line 10, after the word "contract," insert the words "or other obligations."

On page 4, line 7, after the word "law," insert a colon and the words "And provided further, That no settlement or adjustment of any contract or other obligation, made or incurred with any municipality, or other political subdivision, under the provisions of this act, may be made until all taxes and special assessments upon the property of the United States of America, the title to which is in the name of the United States Housing Corporation, and which is situate within such municipality, or other political subdivision, shall have been first canceled or otherwise satisfied of record."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ELLIOTT] is recognized.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, this bill is designed to amend section 5 of an act entitled "An act to authorize the President to provide housing for war needs," approved May 16, 1918, as amended by the act approved July 19, 1919.

It seems that the United States Housing Corporation constructed in various cities of the United States certain buildings for the purpose of housing war workers. At that time this Housing Corporation entered into contracts with these various municipalities by which they put in various kinds of public utilities; and now that the war is over, the United States Housing Corporation has been trying to sell these houses and make settlement with the various corporations.

The amendment of July 19, 1919, was made for the purpose of compelling this Housing Corporation to close up all of its business; to sell these houses and settle up its business and turn the money, whatever it had, into the Treasury of the United States. We supposed, and I think and I believe that the committee thinks, that the Housing Corporation has the power under the law as it now stands to sell all of these buildings and settle its business. But that has been questioned, and they come back to us and ask that the law be amended. The principal amendment is found on page 2, lines 2 and 3, after the word "execute," insert the words "settle and adjust all," which makes the law broader than it was before.

This bill when it came before the committee was given careful consideration and exhaustive hearings, and the committee, after hearing all of the parties, was unanimous in voting that this bill should be reported for passage.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. This Housing Corporation was created by the Government during the war, created by Congress, for a specific service during the war?

Mr. ELLIOTT. It was.

Mr. WINGO. The claims in question and the several suits now pending, as I understand, are all based upon claims for taxes and betterments and certain assessments made for sewers, paving, water supply, street building, and such things as that?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. On what theory does the gentleman think these municipalities were justified in assessing these taxes against an instrumentality of the United States Government?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I do not think they were justified, and it is not the design of this bill to authorize them to pay these taxes. The object of this bill is to give the United States Housing Corporation authority to pay the bills that it actually contracted for with these municipalities or other political subdivisions.

Mr. WINGO. Do you authorize the payment of these taxes?

Mr. LANHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Yes.

Mr. LANHAM. Is there not a specific committee amendment to the bill providing that these contracts shall not be adjusted until all the taxes have been first canceled or otherwise satisfied of record by the municipalities or other political subdivisions?

Mr. ELLIOTT. The object of this bill is to authorize this Housing Corporation to settle all the bills that it legally contracted for.

Mr. WINGO. It is intended to pay the tax bills?

Mr. ELLIOTT. No. On page 4 there is an amendment which provides—

That no settlement or adjustment of any contract or other obligation, made or incurred with any municipality, or other political subdivision, under the provisions of this act, may be made until all taxes and special assessments upon the property of the United States of America, the title to which is in the name of the United States Housing Corporation, and which is situate within said municipality, or other political subdivision, shall have been first canceled or otherwise satisfied of record.

Mr. WINGO. The point I am trying to get at is this: Under your bill do you authorize them to pay the taxes? You authorize them to pay claims. There is nothing in the amendment you have read which prohibits the payment of taxes.

Mr. ELLIOTT. We authorize them to settle and pay the obligations of the Housing Corporation entered into with various municipalities.

Mr. WINGO. Is this bill intended to authorize them to settle these different lawsuits out of court? Will not this bill authorize them to settle what they thought they had the power to settle—that is, all these claims growing not only out of their own contracts but out of the tax and other bills that have been rendered against them?

Mr. ELLIOTT. This bill is designed to authorize the Housing Corporation to settle all legal obligations of that body which it has entered into with these various municipalities.

Mr. WINGO. If they are legal obligations, you do not have to authorize the Housing Corporation to pay them. Is not this to legalize obligations that are not now legal or that are of doubtful legality?

Mr. ELLIOTT. No.

Mr. WINGO. What is the object of the lawsuits? Why are these lawsuits pending? If these are admitted legal contracts and they have authority to settle them, why do you require a curing act of Congress?

Mr. ELLIOTT. If the gentleman will pardon me, lawsuits are very often founded on legal contracts.

Mr. MERRITT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. MERRITT. If the gentleman will allow me, I think I can explain to the gentleman from Arkansas what happened in one case, which will illustrate others. In Bridgeport there was a tax levied on the property, which tax was disputed by the Housing Corporation, whereupon the city said they would not go on with the improvements unless they knew they were going to get their money. Then the Housing Corporation entered into a contract with the city of Bridgeport providing that if the city would make certain improvements the Housing Corporation would pay them as much for those improvements as the corresponding surrounding property of private individuals would have had to pay. In other words, they used the tax on the surrounding property to measure the amount which the Housing Corporation would have to pay. It does not commit the United States or change the status of the United States in any way as to paying taxes, but simply uses that means as a measure for the determination of the amount that the United States shall pay under this contract.

Mr. WINGO. Does the gentleman refer to a betterment or improvement tax, or to a property tax?

Mr. MERRITT. This was for sewers and such things.

Mr. WINGO. That is a betterment or improvement tax.

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. There is no dispute that the Government ought to grant authority to pay its part, but not all, of that kind of a burden. The point I want to get at is that there is a committee amendment referring not only to cancellation but to settlement and payment of these betterment taxes, is there not?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I do not know that I quite understand the gentleman.

Mr. WINGO. You provide here for the cancellation or some other satisfaction on the record of the tax claims, and in the main part of the bill you give them general blanket authority to settle and adjust all contracts or other obligations incurred during the war.

Mr. ELLIOTT. The object of this bill is to authorize the Housing Corporation to settle all legal existing claims against the corporation.

Mr. WINGO. You have authority to pay a specific sum in order to get a cancellation of the tax lien? Then, as I understand, this will not affect these lawsuits challenging the legality of these claims.

Mr. ELLIOTT. If there is a claim that is illegal, they have no right to pay it. I can not attempt to prophesy what will be the outcome of any lawsuit against the United States Housing Corporation.

Mr. WINGO. Is it intended to pay any alleged property taxes or is it intended to confine the payment to the betterment taxes?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I think it is only designed to pay the taxes which the Housing Corporation agreed to pay; that is, special assessments. For instance, in some of these towns and perhaps all of them they entered into contracts with the municipalities for the extension of sewers and water and other things of that character which have not yet been paid for. These things were done under a contract and were a special assessment. I think it was the intention of this bill to authorize them to pay for all those things they agreed to. But the ordinary taxes they assess against other property they had no right to assess against the Government property, and I do not think there is anything in the bill to authorize the Housing Corporation to pay them.

Mr. WINGO. That was not the intention of the committee to do that?

Mr. ELLIOTT. No.

Mr. WINGO. And if the language does it, it is not according to the judgment of the committee?

Mr. ELLIOTT. It is not according to the judgment of the committee.

Mr. CLOUSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I will, but my time is running.

Mr. CLOUSE. In reference to the Bridgeport, Conn., controversy which seems now to be in litigation, does not this amendment to the bill authorize a settlement of that claim regardless of the merits?

Mr. ELLIOTT. This bill is not designed to take care of any particular case, but is to take care of all of them.

Mr. CLOUSE. But it confers power and authority to settle that claim of the city of Bridgeport regardless of the merits.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, if I may be allowed to proceed without interruption, I will make this matter as clear as I can in the 10 minutes allotted to me. This bill only clarifies what the law now is. The additions sought to be made in the existing law are these: In lines 1 and 2, page 2, the words "settle" and "adjust" have been inserted. Those words are not in the existing law. Then, in lines 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8, the words "including contracts or other obligations made or incurred with municipalities or other political divisions for the furnishing of services and facilities to the property of such corporations, and for the construction of public utilities by such municipalities or other political subdivisions in pursuance to the terms of said contract or other obligations" are added. Otherwise the bill is exactly as the law is to-day. By the sundry civil bill of 1919 we amended section 5 of the housing act, and in that amendment we said that the Housing Corporation should thereafter cease to do business except that it might conclude and execute contracts and other obligations made and incurred during the war.

In my judgment, that was ample authority for the Housing Corporation to conclude and execute its contracts, and it seems to me it included the payment of amounts due under them.

However, controversies have arisen in this department and legal opinions have been given to the officials of the Housing Corporation, as they say, and as the statement of the Secretary of Labor to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds shows, as a result of which doubt has been thrown on the authority of the housing officials to settle outstanding contracts made with municipalities. This doubt is based largely on the theory that perhaps it is illegal, or not in pursuance of any law, for the Government to pay what might be considered taxes.

I remember distinctly when the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. Sherley, was chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and was explaining the original housing bill on the floor of the House. He said the reason that we were creating the Housing Corporation was to create an agency of the Government by which things could be done that the Government itself did not or could not do. In order to carry out that purpose this corporation was authorized. Mr. Sherley said that it would be necessary in this housing project for the Government to build sewers and pavements and all that sort of thing and contract to pay for them, and in order to give the Government the power to do so this corporation was created. That was what the act was for; the Housing Corporation was organized under the laws of New York to buy and sell lands, to enter into contracts with municipalities, and to perform other necessary functions, and as a result of that the corporation did enter into a number of contracts.

I want to call your attention to the kind of contracts that were made. I have not the time to go into it at length. The corporation made contracts with various cities by which it agreed that if the cities would lay certain pavements in the housing project, put in sewers, put in lights, put in water, that after the cities had done that and paid for it the Housing Corporation would reimburse them for the expense.

Here is a sample clause that is in the written contract. After providing what the city should construct, it is provided:

The Government shall pay to said city during the period covered by this contract for all special facilities furnished or provided to the said real property of the Government and the residents thereon, and not provided for in said initial agreement, an amount equal to the amount which would be assessed against said real property as a special assessment, including the usual interest and penalties for said above-described real property of the Government subject to taxation, and shall pay said amount when the first installment of such an assessment shall be due.

The corporation made these arrangements by which it did not agree to pay taxes or to pay special assessments, but said, "If you will put these things in for us, we will pay you an amount equal to the amount that otherwise would have been assessed against our property as special assessments." If the objection were made that the Government could not pay taxes, even laying aside the question of the right of this corporation to do things that the Government could not, I imagine that even that language in that contract would have stood the test and would have been held to be good.

As a result of these contracts which they made with many cities throughout the country, these improvements were put in. The general method of putting in these public utilities is by special assessment on the abutting property, and on the basis of those assessments bonds are issued, special assessment bonds, which are sold on the market. That has been done all over the country, and to-day this peculiar situation exists. Those bonds are being presented for payment, in many cases maturing already, and payment is being defaulted. The municipalities have no funds with which to pay them, while there is lying in the treasury of the Housing Corporation ample funds to pay every cent of these obligations which these cities now owe. If I may be excused for referring to something that is happening in my own district, where I have, no doubt, a personal interest, I wish to refer to a telegram that I recently received from the mayor of the city of Rock Island, which is in my district, and to which city over $70,000 is due on account of these special assessments. He says in this telegram that the United States housing bonds are being presented for payment; that the city has no money to take them up; that the holders of them are insisting that they be paid; that the city can not afford to default in the payment of these bonds; and that it is in a bad predicament. He then asked, What is the prospect of remedial legislation?

In taking this matter up with the Housing Corporation, I am told that there is a question about their authority. We then took the matter up with Secretary Davis, who perhaps does not have direct control over the Housing Corporation, but who is at the head of the Labor Department, under whose general jurisdiction the Housing Corporation exists.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. On the Rock Island proposition, were those bonds issued by the city for the sole purpose of paving and sewerage around those Government buildings?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. What is the total issue?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I think about $70,000, all together.

Mr. WINGO. They are making a claim for taxes for a school district and for betterment amounting to $73,000.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. There were contracts made with all of those municipalities.

Mr. WINGO. I am talking about the Rock Island proposition.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes. In our State the various school districts, the counties, the cities, the various subdivisions of the municipal government have the right to levy taxes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman desires, I yield him 10 minutes more.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I do not know how familiar gentlemen of the committee are with the operations of this Housing Corporation, but the projects they built were very large. Up in our community, in the city of Rock Island, and in Moline and in East Moline, which lie along the river, houses were constructed on account of the large number of men in the Government arsenal at that place. The Government built several hundred houses. It built little communities, little cities, with community gathering places, with stores and other facilities. They built them usually in places where there were no streets, no sewers, no water, and then they would get the cities to extend these utilities to the housing project, and make as a result of that a rather complete town. Then when the war was over the Government sold these houses with all of these abutting privileges and got the benefit of them in the increased price received. When the cities go to the corporation and ask it to pay, as it agreed to do in the original contract, they find that there is some doubt about it, and the Government does not pay. If all of these obligations were paid, they would amount to about $500,000.

As I am informed, there is in the treasury of the Housing Corporation about $800,000, which would be available for this purpose and which ought to be used for that purpose. We are in the unfortunate position of having these obligations, which are justly due to these municipalities all over the country, and not being able to get the money because of what can not be more than an ambiguity in the law. Having no other recourse, if this bill does not pass, these cities will have their bonds defaulted. The Secretary of Labor says in his letter, incorporated in the report, that doubts have arisen, that the matter has been discussed in the department among the law officers, and that doubts have arisen, and that this legislation is necessary to clear up those doubts, so that those obligations can be settled.

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. CLOUSE. Referring to the Rock Island matter, I see that the corporation is billed as though sold by the city for services rendered during the year 1919, also for the year 1920 and for the year 1921, with approximately some $30,000. Does the gentleman know what the services were?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes. They were the installment of these special assessments which are coming due—installments that would have been paid if it had been an improvement that the city itself was making.

Mr. CLOUSE. But I see following that the city is claiming $40,000 by virtue of assessments for paving, and so forth. I presume that includes the installation of the necessary sewers?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Oh, yes. I have a list here of the total amount in that city—$70,000. It is all paving. They are special assessments that come in from year to year. This statement in the report was made by the Housing Corporation, and is not very accurate. It was a memorandum that was made for us while we were investigating this matter, for the purpose of trying to get some general idea of how much they did owe, but, as a matter of fact, these are practically all special assessments.

Mr. CLOUSE. Then, the report here is inaccurate when it says that the claims of the city of Rock Island for assessments amount to only $40,000.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. CLOUSE. As a matter of fact, the claim is $70,000?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. This statement in the memorandum is not correct. It was made hurriedly by the officers of the Housing Corporation and does not show the exact situation.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Do I understand that the Housing Corporation in many places constructed dwelling houses and obtained for them sewer and water connections from the cities, and that the Government has either sold those houses or wants to sell them with the understanding that the purchasers would have the use of the water and the sewer connections?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. That is the situation.

Mr. MANN. This part goes into the value?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Absolutely. They have got the value for it. They have sold several hundred houses up in our country with all these privileges.

Mr. MANN. Would it be possible, the city having put in these improvements at its own expense, to shut off the water or sewer connections if they desired to, not having been paid for them?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I do not know whether they could or not, but here is what they tried to do. This happened in many cities. Seeing that the Housing Corporation was not paying the amount that it agreed to pay, a great many municipalities tried to assess these properties for taxes and special assessments. At once the district attorneys in the various jurisdictions brought injunction suits against the taxing bodies and tied them up by injunction on the theory that this was Government property and therefore free from taxes. I am inclined to think if a vigorous fight had been made on some of these injunction suits it might have been held that the Housing Corporation was liable, at least for special assessments, but as it was not made, the injunctions are permanent.

Mr. MANN. Unless we pass this bill we will be in this position. The Government makes use and gets the benefit of sewer and water connections and sells the houses to people upon the basis of having them in, and the purchase price is based upon that condition, then reneges?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. That is the exact situation.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. May I have the attention of the gentleman from Illinois a moment? The situation is worse than that, because in a very large number of these cases the Government, or rather the Housing Corporation, has sold the houses to individuals, and in some cases title was passed, I think, and in others they have a contract of sale outstanding and only 10 per cent of the purchase price has been paid. If the water is shut off and the other betterments are taken from the purchaser we will have a default on the contracts or a foreclosure under the mortgage, and the Government will have all this stuff back on its hands.

Mr. MANN. And the Lord knows we do not want it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I will say in conclusion, let the corporation have the legislation which they say they need to settle up all of these contracts and get it off their hands, and then I am, for one, willing to go along with the rest of the Members here and see that the corporation is wound up and concluded. But as long as these matters are pending with rights not well established, you can not get anywhere.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is the only way, to wind it up and get out of it?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. If we do not pass this bill these various cities will be out that much?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Absolutely.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I will.

Mr. LAYTON. In any case can a settlement be made except on the basis fixed in their contract?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. It must be upon a contractual basis.

Mr. LANHAM. Will the gentleman yield back the remainder of his time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has one minute remaining.

Mr. LANHAM. How much time have I?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana has 10 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Texas 20 minutes.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL].

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the condition that exists in my district in regard to this housing proposition is somewhat different than in other districts. During the war they constructed in Davenport some 200 houses. Immediately following the war they sold all the houses that they had in Davenport; that is, the Housing Corporation, acting for the Government. They put their own price on them, and I believe in less than two days' time they had sold the entire housing proposition in the city of Davenport. I think it was one of the wisest things the Government ever did. They closed up, and at the time they were getting a fair value for the property.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield just a moment? Does not the gentleman think the Government would have done infinitely better if Congress had passed a compulsory law compelling the closing up of all this Housing Corporation and selling all its properties at the time when real estate was high?

Mr. HULL. I certainly do. I do not care to use much of my time in answering this question. I simply want to call attention to the fact that unless we pass a bill and unless the Housing Corporation takes up and settles these things in the city of Davenport they will have a lot of houses back on their hands as suggested by the gentleman from Illinois. The people who bought the houses were laboring people, and I think the contract said they would get fee in simple title free of encumbrance, and then when they came to get title the city wants to levy a tax that the Government has failed to pay it for betterments, sewerage, and the other things.

Now, the effect of that is simply this: That unless the Housing Corporation has this bill and settles it up, these people will be unable to finance themselves, and the Government is going to have these houses back on its hands, and they can not get 50 cents on the dollar compared with what they already have them sold for. I do not think it necessary to take any more of your time. It is simply a business proposition. I do think that this amendment that is placed at the end of the bill by the committee ought to be clarified. I think, in line 11, page 4, we ought to say "except special assessment of betterments." That will clear the whole matter up. Then they will know what you state in your bill, that they are to pay for sewerage, for paving, and the betterments that they contracted with the cities to pay for at the time they built these houses.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back two minutes.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

- S. 1502. An act for the relief of Thomas E. Owen;
- S. 1670. An act for the relief of Buffkin & Girvin;
- S. 1784. An act for the relief of John B. Elliott;
- S. 2095. An act to reimburse the city of Baltimore, State of Maryland, for moneys expended to aid the United States in the construction of works of defense during the Civil War;
- S. 2745. An act to amend subdivision (3) of subsection (B) of section 9 of an act entitled "An act to define, regulate, and punish trading with the enemy, and for other purposes";
- S. 2765. An act for the relief of the Fidelity & Deposit Co. of Maryland, Baltimore, Md.;
- S. 3046. An act to donate the gates at the head of West Executive Avenue in the city of Washington, D. C., to the Hayes Memorial Museum, Fremont, Ohio;
- S. 3098. An act authorizing the extension of the park system in the District of Columbia;

S. J. Res. 137. Joint resolution transferring to the custody of the secretary of the Smithsonian Institution certain relics now in the possession of the Department of State; and

S. J. Res. 156. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to grant a permit to erect and maintain a hotel upon the Fort Monroe Military Reservation in Virginia.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2774) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes,' approved June 3, 1916, and to establish military justice," approved June 4, 1920.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, bills of the following titles:

- H. R. 7483. An act for the relief of Robert G. Whitfield; and
- H. R. 8924. An act to amend the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes."

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 7) to amend section 2 of the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution to authorize the operation of Government-owned radio stations for the use of the general public and for other purposes," approved June 5, 1920, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to bills of the following titles:

- S. 621. An act to amend subdivision (c) of section 206 of the transportation act, 1920; and
- S. 2736. An act providing for the conveyance of certain unused military reservations in the State of Massachusetts to the city of Salem and the town of Marblehead.

HOUSING FOR WAR NEEDS.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO].

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, this bill has two objects. One is to keep on the pay rolls certain gentlemen. The suggestion that these gentlemen are Democrats does not appeal to me at all. I recognize you will not get rid of them or these claims as long as they have some money in the Treasury.

This bill will take about $600,000 out, and that will leave $200,000 more. This very bill will be the basis for claims involving over $4,000,000, to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, if it is passed, and you establish this precedent.

Now, my good friend from Indiana [Mr. ELLIOTT] says that this will authorize them to pay "legal" claims only. I dislike to differ with the gentleman, but as I read his report, and as I kept up with the dispute, the object of this bill is to validate that which is of doubtful legality and which is in litigation in court.

Not one single dollar of a single class, not one single dollar of your betterments, of the streets in front of Government property, not one single dollar of the main lines of sewer in front of this Government property, can be collected out of this Housing Corporation, which, in the last analysis, is the money of the United States Treasury, without the passage of this bill, and no court will ever sustain their claim. And that is the reason why they are coming in here.

Gentlemen, it is not a new proposition. It has been litigated ever since 1868, involving the very theories that are in this lawsuit, and there are 50 or 60 cases which hold what the limit is of the States and local authorities to tax agencies of the United States Government. You can not do it. You are going to authorize by the passage of this bill the payment of bills that are not legal, and that no court will hold are legal. And the only claim you have is in the court of conscience. Now, if there is any municipality that has been injured and has borne a burden by reason of these operations, I will be glad to vote for a bill to pay that, because I do not want the Government to stand on a strict legal liability in meeting an obligation. But every one of these cities received distinct benefits. You can just as well say that these cities will suffer if they are not reimbursed for this paving and for the main line of the sewers as to say that a man on whose land a well had been bored without his authority can go on the assumption that he would make somebody else pay for it, and that that well would be injured just as if you would pull it up out of the ground. Are we going to pull up those sewer mains or that paving? Are we going to get the benefit when these buildings are sold?

In my State governmental agencies went out in time of war and, under the contract, before certain activities could be located, you had to give not only the land—and the same is true in Mississippi and other States—but you had to lay down the sewer and make the connection. You paved the road to the addition, and streets in the addition; in one instance you had to pay cool cash in order to get the location. Pass this bill and the people of that State will come in here and get that enormous sum they have claimed. They will come here from Mississippi and other States. If you want to do it, gentlemen, I do not care. I would like, of course, to accommodate these municipalities, and if you will bring in a bill here that will authorize the payment alone of proper claims, I will support that. I would be willing to support an item to cover what might be termed "betterments accruing solely to Government property." Their merchants and everybody else got the benefit of it, and yet you say because there is $800,000 in the Treasury you are going to authorize this Housing Corporation to reimburse it. Of course, all municipalities are hard up at this time.

You set the precedent as to these municipalities, and do not you worry, there will be claims for over $4,000,000 coming from the other States where cities had to put in this same kind of betterments. You say the war is over, and you have got the money, and that these cities are poor. Is not that true of every other city and class in the country? If it is a legal claim, you do not have to pass this validating statute. Read what the Secretary says in the report as to what these claims are made up of. Have these cities been burdened by giving them these improvements and the great swelled pay rolls during the war? Do they mean to say that they have been imposed on, when we all know that every bit of political pressure was brought to bear here to locate all these improvements we could in each man's district? Cities sent their boards and representatives here and paid hotel bills, and did everything they could to get this. Now, when the tumult and the shouting dies, they say that, while the pavements are there and the sewer mains are there, and that the people who buy from the Government will get the benefit and maybe the Government will get a little better price for the buildings, they are going to lose the benefit of having a governmental agency there and they will have to depend on the private occupant of those houses. All right, gentlemen; you can do it if you want to do so. I do not care. But do not you come and talk about Shipping Board expense or anything else when you put a bill like this through.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. APPLEBY].

Mr. APPLEBY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, a particular case of a housing situation in my district was brought to my attention after this bill was introduced—that of Lincoln Gardens, a suburb located within the city limits of the city of New Brunswick, N. J. One hundred and ninety-five houses were built there by the Government and sold at public sale, with the understanding that all the improvements, in the shape of water, special sewer construction, and so forth, were included in the sale. The contracts for the sale of these houses were entered into, running through a period of 11 years. The purchaser has 11 years in which to pay for them. A number of the people who have these contracts between the Housing Corporation and themselves are desirous of obtaining title, but they can not get a good title for the reason that the city of New Brunswick has filed tax liens against the property.

I have endeavored to get the city to cancel those tax liens for the various years, and they come back to me with the proposition that the Government made a special agreement with them to build what is known as an outfall sewer to cost some $22,000, one half of which was to be paid by the Government—the Housing Corporation—and the other half by the city. The city of New Brunswick has never received one dollar on that contract made with it in good faith by the Government. I am not here arguing only for the city but for the 200 people—the 195, to be exact—who have these contracts and can not get good title to the property.

It seems to me since the Housing Corporation has received that money, some $800,000 from the sale of these various properties, and is holding that money up and refusing to pay their obligations, and the people who have made partial payments on the contracts can not get title to the property, it is a very serious proposition, and legislation of this sort, which will give the Housing Corporation power to settle the claims, is a fair bill. That is my interest in the matter.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. APPLEBY. Certainly.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman does not mean to say that there is any lawyer up there who seriously contends that they can sustain their tax liens?

Mr. APPLEBY. They are sustaining them.

Mr. WINGO. Can the gentleman tell of a Federal court that will sustain that claim?

Mr. APPLEBY. This case has not been taken to court.

Mr. WINGO. I thought the gentleman had said that had been done.

Mr. APPLEBY. That is in the Bridgeport case, one of the Connecticut cases.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. APPLEBY. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does this bill cover all in the list of claims of that class?

Mr. APPLEBY. All cases where claims have been filed with the Housing Corporation.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is there any prospect of other cities coming in?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Absolutely none. In every case where there is any contract or any claim of any kind on account of any housing project, they are in this list.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. This is supposed to wind it up?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. That applies to the Housing Corporation, but it does not apply to the War and Navy Departments.

Mr. APPLEBY. This applies to the Housing Corporation.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. APPLEBY. Yes.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I have knowledge of a claim by the city of Bethlehem for several thousand dollars under an agreement by which they paid an architect for the work on this Housing Corporation proposition there with an understanding or contract with the Government to get that back. I notice that is not included in this bill.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. That is not included because it is not in this class of claims.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I thought the gentleman said it was included.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. No; I am talking about contracts made for public utilities.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. That is not a contract for public utilities.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, is the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ELLIOTT] going to use any more of his time?

Mr. ELLIOTT. No. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the bill be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The bill was again read, with the committee amendments, as follows:

Page 2, line 5, after the word "contracts," insert "or other obligations," and after the word "made," in the same line, insert the words "or incurred."

In line 6, after the word "municipalities," insert the words "or other political subdivisions."

In line 9, after the word "municipalities," insert the words "or other political subdivisions."

In line 10, after the word "contracts," insert the words "or other obligations."

On page 4, after the word "law," in line 7, insert a colon and the following:

"And provided further, That no settlement or adjustment of any contract or other obligation, made or incurred with any municipality, or other political subdivision, under the provisions of this act, may be made until all taxes and special assessments upon the property of the United States of America, the title to which is in the name of the United States Housing Corporation, and which is situate within such municipality, or other political subdivision, shall have been first canceled or otherwise satisfied of record."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the first committee amendment.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will not these amendments be considered separately?

The CHAIRMAN. They will be considered separately. The Clerk will report the first committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 5, after the word "contracts," insert the words "or other obligations."

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, that amendment would authorize the settlement of claims based on contracts, contracts which, I think, every lawyer will concede they had no authority to make, although there might be some argument in favor of validating them because the Government got the benefit. But you say you are authorized to satisfy one other class of obligations, and that is the general property tax obligation. If you want to limit it to obligations that have been incurred in good faith by the corporation with these different municipalities, all right.

That is your argument. But you propose by this amendment to go further. I hope the amendment will be defeated.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, there might be some force in the gentleman's argument if this were adding anything to the law as it now exists. The law as it now exists, and as it was enacted by the sundry civil bill of 1919, reads this way:

To conclude and execute contracts or other obligations made or incurred during the war—

And so forth. So you will notice that the words "or other obligations" were used in the act which is now the law. As I understand it, the committee in passing on this inserted the words "or other obligations" in order to conform with the language of the existing law.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. The existing law authorized them to make contracts or other obligations. That would have quite a distinct meaning from the language you use here. You amend the existing law and authorize them to "settle," and under the discretion which you claim they had you say it would authorize them to cover every possible obligation that had been made. That is the gentleman's argument, that they made contracts with these municipalities. They would not have to be written contracts. You are undertaking to change the law, and the change in the law would give a different effect to these same words here, and for that very reason the first draftsman of the bill left out the words "or other obligations," because he recognized the effect of the change.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The law now provides that they can conclude or execute contracts or other obligations made or incurred during the war. That is the law which it is proposed to amend. Now, in inserting the amendment about municipalities they simply carry the same language; that is all.

Mr. WINGO. I do not object to the words "or other political subdivisions."

Mr. MANN. It simply carries the same language which is carried already in the law, which authorizes them to conclude and execute contracts or other obligations. Now, the only new language is the words "settle and adjust." When you say "contracts or other obligations" and then go on and say "including so-and-so," you naturally repeat that language the way you have already covered it, or else it would be considered as excluding something already covered by the law; and the only question here is whether, having given them authority to conclude and execute contracts, we will add the words "settle and adjust" contracts. That, I take it, comes of a hypercriticism of the law—I think that is the proper word—because everybody supposed, unless it was some hypercritical lawyer, that when that language was used authority to conclude and execute contracts gave authority to settle and adjust them. What else does it mean?

Mr. WINGO. Is the gentleman asking me?

Mr. MANN. No; I am simply suggesting that the words "or other obligations" in this bill are in conformity with the previous law.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman does not think it has any effect at all on the words "or other obligations." Does the gentleman think that is a hypercritical suggestion?

Mr. MANN. No; but the other obligations are already included in the bill. The only thing about this particular amendment is that it is said that that includes municipalities. I think it would include them whether it is inserted here or not, but there may be some question in the minds of the Housing Corporation.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman is a good lawyer and not a hypercritical one. Is the Housing Corporation given authority to incur tax obligations?

Mr. MANN. That is not a matter for the board to determine.

Mr. WINGO. Possibly the gentleman has overlooked what I had in mind. It was stated that the board had a contract or had a verbal agreement that if the municipality would do certain things the Housing Corporation would give them a gratuity in a sum equal to the tax which they had no authority to pay. Does the gentleman think they had authority to make any such agreement or to incur any such obligation?

Mr. MANN. Why, certainly. The Housing Corporation had authority to let a contract for the building of a house or a number of houses. In connection with that they had authority to let a contract for the building of a street. They had authority in connection with that to construct a water system or a sewer system; but it was much cheaper for them to arrange with the municipality, so that they could get the water from the water system of the municipality and to connect their sewer system with the sewer system of the municipality. Otherwise they might have been without an outlet, except at great expense. I think they undoubtedly had the right to enter into that contract. They had a right to enter into any contract for the providing of the necessary facilities according to the modern notion of houses in cities. My district has no interest in this, because they never came to Chicago to build any of these houses.

Mr. WINGO. No; I do not think they did.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 5, after the word "made," insert "or incurred."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 6, after the word "municipalities," insert "or other political subdivisions."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 9, after the word "municipalities," insert "or other political subdivisions."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 10, after the word "contract," insert "or other obligation."

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, of course, there is no doubt in the mind of any lawyer that they had authority to make certain contracts, but they had no authority to bind either directly or indirectly any property or fund they had for the payment of a tax upon a governmental agency.

If they did have, you would not have this bill in here. The original law as now written does not authorize them to do certain things with reference to other contracts or obligations. You may very properly, because there is some force in the argument, authorize them to settle contracts which are legal but which some one may have some doubt about on account of being interwoven with illegal contracts. The words used in here are for the sole purpose of settling a void contract, not a voidable one, but absolutely void, and there is not a lawyer in the House who has any regard for his reputation that will say that the courts have not settled this identical question. In at least three leading cases involving agents—not Government-owned property, but private corporations acting as Government agents and conferred with agency powers by congressional statute—they have passed on this identical question. This is only a bluff to get you to reimburse cities for these permanent betterments—making you pay for the streets that were built, because, forsooth, you say they had authority to build streets, but they called on the cities to build them. Of course, the cities would be glad to build the streets and additions. In one case there were 700 new homes. Of course, the city would be glad to put a sewer out there. There is one claim coming in regard to a county in Florida where they floated $500,000 of bonds, and objection was made to the floating of a bond issue that this was not to be a permanent Government institution, and that later it would not be worth one cent to the community for community purposes. Now, they are to abandon it, and these people will have a right to come in on the same footing as those in this bill and ask that they be reimbursed. If you reimburse one community for building streets through Government activity, reimburse one city for laying a sewer main in the street, reimburse one city for putting sidewalks in front of Government property, that they are to have and the only change contemplated is a change of ownership—you do that and you will have all the other communities come in here and demand that they be treated the same way.

The Clerk read the following committee amendment:

Page 4, line 7, after the word "law" insert:

"And provided further, That no settlement or adjustment of any contract or other obligation, made or incurred with any municipality or other political subdivision under the provisions of this act, may be made until all taxes and special assessments upon the property of the United States of America, the title to which is in the name of the United States Housing Corporation, and which is situate within such municipality or other political subdivision, shall have been first canceled or otherwise satisfied of record."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 15, after the word "record," insert "and said corporation shall report to Congress from time to time all settlements or adjustments made under authority herein."

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, we will accept that amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask my colleague, the gentleman from Illinois, how you can work out this sort of a proposition practically. Is the gentleman satisfied that it can be worked out practically? I admit that whatever assessment of taxes there are that they must be disposed of if a settlement is to be made.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Let me answer that in rather a roundabout way. I suggested to the president of the Housing Corporation when this proposition was advanced to me that there might be some practical difficulties about taking the taxes off the books, the tax being extended thereon. I can see practical difficulties about it now, I am frank to say. It seems to me if I was going to do it I would go about it in this way. I would make an agreement with the district attorney by which a mandatory injunction would compel the removal of the taxes.

Mr. MANN. No mandatory injunction can take a tax off the books. They can restrain the collection of it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. There are cases where a permanent injunction is in force in some cases.

Mr. MANN. I doubt whether a tax official who is responsible for the money received by him can mark a tax off unless he turns the money over.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. NORTON. In all cases wherever there is a question about the taxes a court can issue a permanent injunction, and that will satisfy it on the record. That leaves the record clear for all time.

Mr. MANN. If you can work it out in that way, all right.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I do not know whether we can or not.

Mr. MANN. I think I could have framed language which would have covered it without putting it in that shape.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. This is not my language, it is the language of the Department of Labor.

Mr. MANN. Then it is probably not right. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment, as amended.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, on page 2, line 10, I think there should be an amendment striking out the word "contract" in the singular, and inserting the word "contracts" in the plural.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I think that is correct.

Mr. MANN. I offer that amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MANN: Page 2, line 10, strike out the word "contract" and insert in lieu thereof the word "contracts."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I have been unable to locate this section 5, as amended. I have no doubt that it has been amended, but I can not locate it.

Mr. MANN. It has been amended all right. I located it, though I can not give the gentleman the citation.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. It is the act of July 19, 1919.

Mr. WALSH. The deficiency or the sundry civil appropriation act?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The sundry civil appropriation act.

Mr. MANN. I say I located it. My secretary did, and it was compared.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. It is an amendment to that section?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9597) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the President to provide housing for war needs," and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded upon any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. WINGO) there were—ayes 49, noes 2.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum and challenge the vote for that reason.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. It is clear there is not a quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 230, nays 78, answered "present" 3, not voting 119, as follows:

So the bill was passed.

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. LANGLEY with Mr. CLARK of Florida.

Mr. WINSLOW with Mr. O'BRIEN.

Mr. OSBORNE with Mr. GALLIVAN.

Mr. DENISON with Mr. BANKHEAD.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois with Mr. RIORDAN.

Mr. SNELL with Mr. WOODS of Virginia.

Mr. VARE with Mr. KINCHELOE.

Mr. OLPP with Mr. MCSWAIN.

Mr. ELLIS with Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania.

Mr. LAWRENCE with Mr. SULLIVAN.

Mr. CANNON with Mr. WISE.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana with Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee.

Mr. REBER with Mr. MARTIN.

Mr. MONDELL with Mr. OLDFIELD.

Mr. REED of New York with Mr. RUCKER.

Mr. HILL with Mr. DOMINICK.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania with Mr. HUMPHREY.

Mr. CODD with Mr. MONTAGUE.

Mr. SPEAKS with Mr. POUL.

Mr. CHINDBLOM with Mr. DRANE.

Mr. STRONG of Pennsylvania with Mr. LYON.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma with Mr. OVERSTREET.

Mr. RADCLIFFE with Mr. RAINEY of Illinois.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee with Mr. UPSHAW.

Mr. OGDEN with Mr. KITCHIN.

Mr. KENDALL with Mr. RAINEY of Alabama..

Mr. HOGAN with Mr. KUNZ.

Mr. VAILE with Mr. WARD of North Carolina.

Mr. KENNEDY with Mr. TAGUE.

Mr. DICKINSON with Mr. PARRISH.

Mr. KAHN with Mr. MEAD.

Mr. LEHLBACH with Mr. FULMER.

Mr. VOLK with Mr. BRINSON.

Mr. MUDD with Mr. CANTRILL.

Mr. KNUTSON with Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington with Mr. DRIVER.

Mr. ANTHONY with Mr. CAREW.

Mr. KNIGHT with Mr. MANSFIELD.

Mr. HAYES with Mr. STOLL.

Mr. COLE of Ohio with Mr. TEN EYCK.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

On motion of Mr. ELLIOTT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record by printing a letter from Capt. L. M. Overstreet, United States Navy, showing the amount of Federal taxes compared with State, county, and municipal taxes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks for the purpose indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MacGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record on the St. Lawrence Ship Canal, including a report of the investigation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record on the St. Lawrence Ship Canal.

Mr. MANN. Including what?

Mr. MacGREGOR. Including the report of the investigation, which I think will be very interesting to Members.

Mr. MANN. How long is it?

Mr. MacGREGOR. Well, it is quite lengthy, but I think it will be of value to the Members of the House who are interested in the proposition.

Mr. MANN. Well, I doubt the advisability of printing some long report of a private individual on a subject of that kind in the Record.

Mr. MacGREGOR. I would like to get it before the Members. This is a very large subject.

Mr. MANN. Well, I shall not object; but if everybody is going to print the opinion of private individuals on the St. Lawrence project in the Record we will have to enlarge the Printing Office.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

LEGISLATION REGARDING SEVERAL INDIAN RESERVATIONS OR TRIBES.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill H. R. 10193, and pending that motion I desire to see if we can not arrange a short time for general debate. I would like to ask the gentleman from Arizona if he has made any arrangement or had any requests?

Mr. HAYDEN. I have had requests for an hour and a half, but I have asked gentlemen who asked for an hour to forego at this time in order that the bill might be passed this afternoon. I can get along with 30 minutes, and if consent is granted I will divide it between two gentlemen.

Mr. SNYDER. I will be willing to agree to 40 minutes general debate, and the gentleman from Arizona can have 30 minutes, as far as I am concerned.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks that general debate be limited to 40 minutes. The gentleman from New York to control 10 minutes and the gentleman from Arizona 30 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10193, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10193, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10193) extending time for allotments on the Crow Reservation; protecting certain members of the Five Civilized Tribes; payment for tuition of Indian children in Montana; relief of Indians occupying certain lands in Arizona, New Mexico, and California; issuing patents in fee in certain cases; establishing a revolving fund on the Rosebud Reservation; leasing, for mining purposes, certain lands on the Fort Peck, Mont., Reservation; memorial to Indians of the Rosebud Reservation killed in the World War; additional water rights on the Crow Reservation; conferring authority on the Secretary of the Interior as to alienation in certain Indian allotments; and for other purposes.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, there appeared in the New York Tribune of the 18th instant a Washington dispatch which reads in part as follows:

[From the Tribune's Washington bureau.]

WASHINGTON, February 17.

The entire fleet of merchant ships owned by the United States Government will be offered for sale on February 21, it was announced today by Joseph W. Powell, president of the Emergency Fleet Corporation. The total of 1,470 vessels included is expected to net the Government close to $200,000,000, or an average of $20 a ton.

"If the subsidy bill is passed," said one official, "the Government will find a ready market at the top world-market prices, but if Government aid is refused only a miraculous advance in ocean commerce will stimulate the market."

"The Fleet Corporation's advertisement will call for offers on all Government tonnage, to be sold at private competitive sale. No award will be made before March 14, the date set for closing of bids.

"The Fleet Corporation also stipulates that the twenty-three 535-foot and 502-foot combination passenger and cargo vessels now under construction will be sold in fleets, in order that constant service on selected routes may be possible in compliance with the intent of the merchant marine act. It is the desire of the Shipping Board that 12 of these vessels be employed in the Pacific trade, 5 in the London service, 2 on South American routes, and 4 on the Bremen schedule.

"The administration subsidy program will be laid before Congress late next week in a special message by President Harding, and the majority leaders of both Houses will give the proposal their hearty approval and support, it was indicated to-day at the White House."

Similar articles appeared in the press generally.

Whatever sales of our ships that may be made must be under the authority of the merchant marine act of 1920. Such authority is as follows:

SEC. 5. That in order to accomplish the declared purposes of this act and to carry out the policy declared in section 1 hereof, the board is authorized and directed to sell, as soon as practicable, consistent with good business methods and the objects and purposes to be attained by this act, at public or private competitive sale after appraisalment and due advertisement, to persons who are citizens of the United States, except as provided in section 6 of this act, all of the vessels referred to in section 4 of this act or otherwise acquired by the board. Such sale shall be made at such prices and on such terms and conditions as the board may prescribe, but the completion of the payment of the purchase price and interest shall not be deferred more than 15 years after the making of the contract of sale. The board in fixing or accepting the sale price of such vessels shall take into consideration the prevailing domestic and foreign market price of, the available supply of, and the demand for vessels, existing freight rates and prospects of their maintenance, the cost of constructing vessels of similar types under prevailing conditions, as well as the cost of the construction or purchase price of the vessels to be sold, and any other facts or conditions that would influence a prudent, solvent business man in the sale of similar vessels or property which he is not forced to sell.

It was stated in one of the newspapers that the "sale of the fleet is in line with the administration's declared determination to get the Government out of the shipping business." I, too, am in favor of getting the Government out of the shipping business as soon as possible, but the Shipping Board has no authority to sell this immense fleet, representing a cost of about $2,500,000,000, except in the manner and under the conditions explained in section 5 of the merchant marine act, which I have just read.

As still further evidence of the fact that it was not the intention of Congress for these ships to be given away or thrown on the market when conditions were such that there was admittedly no sale therefor, I call attention to section 7 of said act, which provides in part as follows:

The board is authorized to sell, and if a satisfactory sale can not be made, to charter such of the vessels referred to in section 4 of this act or otherwise acquired by the board, as will meet these requirements to responsible persons who are citizens of the United States who agree to establish and maintain such lines upon such terms of payment and other conditions as the board may deem just and necessary to secure and maintain the service desired; and if any such steamship line is deemed desirable and necessary, and if no such citizen can be secured to supply such service by the purchase or charter of vessels on terms satisfactory to the board, the board shall operate vessels on such line until the business is developed so that such vessels may be sold on satisfactory terms and the service maintained, or unless it shall appear within a reasonable time that such line can not be made self-sustaining.

While officials of the Shipping Board are quoted as estimating that our immense fleet will bring $200,000,000 at the proposed sale, yet it does not definitely appear as to whether this estimate is predicated upon present values or upon values in anticipation of subsidy legislation or whether it is an estimate of the sale price after the enactment of subsidy legislation.

It is certain that under the existing depressed conditions and the very low ebb of world shipping, these ships can not be sold at anything like their real value or what they would bring when conditions improve. All the authorities agree that there is no adequate sale for the ships at this time.

In an address last May, James A. Farrell, president of the United States Steel Corporation, declared:

It is questionable whether under present conditions any considerable tonnage could be sold except at a sacrifice which is not warranted, pending a revival of business in foreign markets, and considering the nominal cost of maintenance laid up.

While the cost of the ships will be written down eventually to a reasonable figure, the ships can not be sold until a market exists for them, and until that the investors will not furnish the money to buy them.

In a statement last year, Charles Piez, former Director General of the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation, declared:

At the present time ships, like other commodities, are a drug on the market.

In the hearings before the Appropriations Committee the latter part of last July, Chairman Lasker was asked the following question, and gave the following reply:

Mr. KELLEY. Of course, this is not the right time to sell any kind of ships. You would have considerable difficulty in selling a steel ship, would you not?

Mr. LASKER. I make the prediction that you will never reach the time when you will sell these wooden ships. You can not give a ship away to-day. I mean that literally, if a man must pay the cost of operation.

In the same hearings, Mr. J. B. Smull, one of the experts employed by Chairman Lasker, stated:

There is no possibility of selling boats to-day at any price.

On the 12th of last August, the chairman of the Appropriations Committee [Mr. MADDEN] declared on this floor:

There is no chance to sell the ships now. You could not give a ship away.

All of these authorities were undoubtedly correct in their statements and there has certainly been no change in conditions since those utterances were made. Consequently, we may well inquire as to what is the purpose of the Shipping Board in now throwing all of our ships upon the market.

From the standpoint of the Government and the taxpayers it would certainly be a monstrous and indefensible proposition to practically give these ships away, and then subsequently enhance their value as it is predicted would be done by the enactment of subsidy legislation. Some of the newspaper articles stated that it was intended to sell the vessels "on a rising market," presumably in anticipation of subsidy legislation. However, in view of the past fate of proposed subsidy legislation, it is foolish to think that a mere prospect will materially stimulate prices.

Furthermore, if it is intended by those in authority to enact subsidy legislation, and if it is known that such can be done as is declared, why not wait until after the enactment of such legislation and then sell the ships after the market has actually advanced instead of selling on the nebulous prospect of "a rising market."

Certainly nobody is foolish enough to believe that subsidy legislation can be enacted prior to the closing of bids on March 14, less than three weeks hence. No bill for that purpose has even been introduced, no hearings have been held before any committee of the House or the Senate. On the other hand, when the proposition is definitely presented and the American people are heard from, it is more than likely that such legislation will not be enacted at all. There is nothing more certain than that it will not be enacted by March 14. Consequently, in any aspect of the case, a sale of this fleet at this time, prior to the improvement of shipping conditions and even prior to the proposed artificial and superficial stimulus, is not only without authority and in direct violation of the authority vested in the Shipping Board but would constitute the most colossal betrayal of the rights of the people ever perpetrated in any Government. Will it be contended by any Member of this House that such a sale would be "consistent with good business methods" or that it would be made under "conditions that would influence a prudent, solvent business man in the sale of similar vessels or property which he is not forced to sell"?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I will be glad to yield, if I have time, after I have concluded my statement.

Even if the proposed subsidy legislation is enacted and the ships are then sold for $200,000,000, how would the Government come out? The act provides that the vessels may be sold on not exceeding 15 years' time, and it may be reasonably inferred that most, if not all, of the purchasers would purchase on the basis of the time limit. In addition to indirect subsidies, it is proposed to pay an annual direct cash subsidy of $30,000,000. In 15 years the direct subsidy would amount to $450,000,000. In other words, it would involve selling these vessels in the outset for less than one-tenth of their cost and at one-third or one-fourth of what their value would have been in normal times prior to the World War or of what their market value will be when conditions and prices again become normal, and then in the form of a direct subsidy we would be paying the purchasers all that they had contracted to pay for the ships and $250,000,000 as a clear net bonus. This bonus would be paid twice as rapidly as their purchase payments would accrue. In other words, the iniquitous proposal would amount to absolutely giving away our entire fleet of 1,448 steel vessels, besides the 276 wood and concrete vessels, and then giving the private owners a direct subsidy of $250,000,000 additional besides indirect subsidies. I do not believe that even this Congress will stand for any such proposition. I am sure that the American people will not.

I am aware that there has been much propaganda and misrepresentation as to the character and quality of our ships. However, the fact that our war-built vessels have received the 100 A-1 classification from Lloyd's Register of Shipping proves that our work is fully up to the standards of the British yards. I cite British yards specifically because their workmanship has always been accepted as the world standard. Lloyd's is a British organization, and it may be fairly inferred that they would not give our vessels any higher rating than is justified.

Along the same line I will quote further from the address of James A. Farrell, delivered at Cleveland last May, who, in referring to our Shipping Board vessels, said:

The steel ships were well constructed, and with few exceptions, compare favorably with the work of the best builders in any country. While we may only surmise what will ultimately become of the wooden ships which were built as a result of the dictates of military necessity, and in response to the appeal from our associates for ships, and more ships, the fact remains that our steel ships are fine examples of the skill of American mechanics.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. May I have two minutes more?

Mr. HAYDEN. I will yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. He says this is true with only a few exceptions. Mr. Lasker now says about half of them are first class.

Furthermore, about the cost of them you have heard a great deal said. What does Mr. Farrell say about that?

The claim is made, and justly, that the cost of American ships must reasonably approximate the costs of their competitors, and that capital charges must be substantially equalized with those of our competitors. The fact remains that while a considerable number of ships built abroad have been sold under stress of necessity at less than half the cost of reproduction, as in the case of ex-enemy ships sold by Great Britain, the great bulk of the world's tonnage built during the war fairly approximates the average cost of our own fleet.

In speaking of our Shipping Board vessels, Edward N. Hurley declared:

The ships are good, strong ones, of much better quality, equipment, and finish than the cargo vessels of Europe.

He further calls attention to the run-down condition of the European fleet. Most of the European vessels were constructed at different dates prior to the World War. A large percentage of them are not only old type, but old vessels.

Wherefore, in spite of the contention to the contrary of those who have been intrusted with the authority of disposing of our merchant marine to the best advantage, we have a valuable property in our tremendous merchant marine fleet, which involves such a large investment of the people's money, and I enter my protest against it being given away to the greedy private interests who are clamoring for it, and who seem to have so completely gotten the ear of the present chairman of the Shipping Board.

I will now yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. The American Federation of Labor has made an investigation and report that as to the retail price of coal, for instance in the cities of San Francisco and Los Angeles, the price is $19 per ton. Coal at our mines in West Virginia is quoted as being sold at prices ranging from $1.60 to $2.25 a ton.

Hundreds of these vessels are tied up now for want of cargo and business. Does not the gentleman think the Shipping Board ought to utilize these vessels in transporting coal from the Atlantic to the Pacific seaboard and elsewhere in order to meet the requirements of people for cheap fuel?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. It occurs to me that that is a reasonable proposition. In that connection I wish to state that the fuel bill constitutes 30 or 40 per cent of the cost of operating a cargo vessel, and if the United States ports are given the United States coal at anything like what they ought to get it for they will have a very great advantage in the fuel bill over the ships of any other nation on earth. [Applause.]

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 13 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY].

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I do not wish to indulge, and do not often indulge, in extreme statements, but my friend from Tennessee and I have purposely taken advantage of this opportunity in order, if possible, to arouse at least the interest of Congress in what seems to us to be a very urgently important matter. In my judgment, if the publications in the New York Tribune are true, they set forth the boldest projected steal ever perpetrated in the history of the United States. This may not be viewed as a steal by those engaged in it. The Government owns, paid for by the money of the people, one of the greatest merchant marine fleets on the top of God's earth, and it is proposed, if the Tribune's statement is correct, to sell it for a song. Now, what it cost us does not make any difference. What it is worth as compared with what it is to be sold for does make a difference. It cost us about $225 per ton to build it, and Mr. Farrell and others quoted by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] say that most of those ships are as fine ships as there are in the world, and they are new. Yet the proposition goes out that the Shipping Board or the Emergency Fleet Corporation proposes to sell those ships at a round sum of $200,000,000, or over a million tons of shipping at $20 a ton, or thereabouts.

Mr. BLACK. Does not the gentleman think that the Congress ought in the near future to pass a law repealing that authorization in the Shipping Board act to sell these ships? I agree with my colleague that now is no time to sell an asset of that kind.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. If the gentleman will permit, the Shipping Board act amply safeguards the rights of the Government, but it is not obeyed. The question is, Will the Shipping Board obey it?

Take the case of the Leviathan. This House passed an amendment to a bill pending before it the other day that the Shipping Board should not have repairs done outside of the Government navy yards if the Government navy yards would do the work for less money, and the Senate took that same measure when it went to it and, as I understand it, incorporated in its passage a provision to the effect that no repairs costing over $5,000 should be done under private contract if the Government was able to do it for less money in its navy yards. And the Boston Navy Yard was ready, and offered an estimate of $6,000,000 to put the Leviathan in repair. The printer's ink was not dry on this record of the Senate and the House until we were informed that the Shipping Board had let the contract for the repair of the Leviathan at $8,200,000 to a private company, which admitted that it would have to spend $600,000 to take that ship, before it could be conditioned, to the Boston Navy Yard dry dock. What sort of a condition have we reached—

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Is it true that gentlemen on the other side, under the old administration, when it was offered to repair the Leviathan at a much smaller sum than that, raised all kinds of disturbance?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. If I am not mistaken, we had a sale of the Leviathan for some millions of dollars. It was enjoined by some public-spirited citizens, who ought to get busy now. The temporary injunction was issued and the bid was withdrawn and the sale fell down. To-day we are informed by the chairman of the Shipping Board that when we spend $8,200,000 to recondition and equip the Leviathan we could probably get $6,000,000 or $7,000,000 for it; and yet we talk of economy and saving, and we are now confronted with the proposition that we will sell our entire merchant fleet at $20 or less per ton, when before the war you could not build those ships for less than $65 per ton in this country or in England, and you can not build them to-day for less. In fact, I doubt if they can be built in the United States for less than $100 per ton.

The question is this: Put these ships en masse upon the market and, who can bid for them? The little man can not. Only the big corporations, that have their well-understood gentlemen's agreements, can bid. There has been a tendency to beat down the price of those ships almost from the day we first owned them. The shipping act of 1920 provided a wise policy. It said it was the purpose of this Government to organize and establish a great merchant marine. For that purpose they offered and endeavored to sell the ships that were owned by the Government at a fair market price to American citizens, regardless of what they cost.

Mr. OLIVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I will.

Mr. OLIVER. Is it not a fact that the present chairman of the board, since he took charge, in every public utterance has depreciated the value of these ships?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. The present chairman of the board in every utterance to the public has depreciated the value of these ships, and says there is no market for them. He has said so time and again.

Mr. OLIVER. And by that he depreciates them the more?

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Do you think the chairman of the Shipping Board told the truth and stated the facts fairly?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. That there was no market now?

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Yes; and so did Mr. Farrell and so did Mr. Piez. I think we all know that if these ships are put upon the market now it means they are to throw them away.

Mr. LONDON. A trustee would not be permitted by a court to sell the ships on a flat market.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. If a trustee made a sale and you would show these conditions to the court, the court would set aside the sale. It is being done as if the Government is a pauper and has to save something from the wreck and ruin.

The truth of the business is the so-called Jones bill provides a wise policy. It says the Government shall take these ships and sell them for a fair price, taking into consideration what they could be rebuilt for and what ships were selling for in the markets of the world, and taking into consideration the fact that the Government was not forced to sell; that taking all these things into consideration, the Shipping Board can sell the ships if they can find a purchaser.

To get the exact policy prescribed by the law, let us read it:

SEC. 5. That in order to accomplish the declared purposes of this act, and to carry out the policy declared in section 1 hereof, the board is authorized and directed to sell, as soon as practicable, consistent with good business methods and the objects and purposes to be attained by this act, at public or private competitive sale after appraisal and due advertisement, to persons who are citizens of the United States except as provided in section 6 of this act, all of the vessels referred to in section 4 of this act or otherwise acquired by the board. Such sale shall be made at such prices and on such terms and conditions as the board may prescribe, but the completion of the payment of the purchase price and interest shall not be deferred more than 15 years after the making of the contract of sale. The board in fixing or accepting the sale price of such vessels shall take into consideration the prevailing domestic and foreign market price of, the available supply of, and the demand for vessels, existing freight rates and prospects of their maintenance, the cost of constructing vessels of similar types under prevailing conditions, as well as the cost of the construction or purchase price of the vessels to be sold, and any other facts or conditions that would influence a prudent, solvent business man in the sale of similar vessels or property which he is not forced to sell. All sales made under the authority of this act shall be subject to the limitations and restrictions of section 9 of the "shipping act, 1916," as amended.

SEC. 6. That the board is authorized and empowered to sell to aliens, at such prices and on such terms and conditions as it may determine, not inconsistent with the provisions of section 5 (except that completion of the payment of the purchase price and interest shall not be deferred more than 10 years after the making of the contract of sale), such vessels as it shall, after careful investigation, deem unnecessary to the promotion and maintenance of an efficient American merchant marine; but no such sale shall be made unless the board, after diligent effort, has been unable to sell, in accordance with the terms and conditions of section 5, such vessels to persons citizens of the United States, and has, upon an affirmative vote of not less than five of its members, spread upon the minutes of the board, determined to make such sale; and it shall make as a part of its records a full statement of its reasons for making such sale. Deferred payments of purchase price of vessels under this section shall bear interest at the rate of not less than 5½ per cent per annum, payable semiannually.

SEC. 7. That the board is authorized and directed to investigate and determine as promptly as possible after the enactment of this act and from time to time thereafter what steamship lines should be established and put in operation from ports in the United States or any Territory, District, or possession thereof to such world and domestic markets as in its judgment are desirable for the promotion, development, expansion, and maintenance of the foreign and coastwise trade of the United States and an adequate postal service, and to determine the type, size, speed, and other requirements of the vessels to be employed upon such lines and the frequency and regularity of their sailings, with a view to furnishing adequate, regular, certain, and permanent service. The board is authorized to sell, and if a satisfactory sale can not be made, to charter such of the vessels referred to in section 4 of this act or otherwise acquired by the board, as will meet these requirements, to responsible persons who are citizens of the United States who agree to establish and maintain such lines upon such terms of payment and other conditions as the board may deem just and necessary to secure and maintain the service desired; and if any such steamship line is deemed desirable and necessary, and if no such citizen can be secured to supply such service by the purchase or charter of vessels on terms satisfactory to the board, the board shall operate vessels on such line until the business is developed so that such vessels may be sold on satisfactory terms and the service maintained, or unless it shall appear within a reasonable time that such line can not be made self-sustaining.

You will note the law says, as to fixing the price, "considering that they were owned by an owner who was not forced to sell," but they are being thrown out as though we were forced to sell them.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question? I ask for information.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I saw over 300 of these ships down in the York River some time ago. I think they had been there almost a year. Are they deteriorating rapidly?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Are they wooden ships or steel ships?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. They are steel.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I will say this to the gentleman, that there are many privately owned ships tied up now, and that there is not a private corporation or company that can keep those vessels if the Government of the United States can not do so.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. What I wanted to know was whether or not they were really deteriorating.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I understand that any vessel that is laid up and not taken care of is bound to depreciate.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I understand that about 207 are now up in the Hudson River also in the same condition.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I want to say to the gentleman that I am ready to admit that it is a difficult problem. The Government is the owner of a great property that it is better able to take care of than any private individual, and it is criminal to give them away to private individuals, or, rather, to great combinations or corporations.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. How long will it take these ships to become absolutely valueless if they remain unused as they are to-day?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. If cared for, I think it would take 20 years. They might be put a little out of condition, but, if cared for, at any time in 20 years' time they can be reconditioned. Take the whole Jones Act; if they were to obey that law, a great deal of loss could be avoided. The gentleman from West Virginia spoke about the fact that there are vast demands for coal. The Government could utilize those vessels to transport that coal from where it is to where it is needed. The Government can find something for them to do, and the Government can care for them better than can any individual. But what will happen if you sell them in fleets, as proposed? No one but those who are already selected, perhaps, will come in and bid; some line like the Munson Line or the Pacific Line would come in and bid on a whole fleet.

I was on one of those ships, not as big a ship as the Leviathan, but a very big one, the Southern Cross, arranging to make a trip from New York down to Rio Janeiro. That vessel, I suppose, will go as a part of the fleet. It cost $7,000,000, or about $300 per ton. We hold a number of these great big ships. None but a great big corporation will bid for them now. Now, the big shipping corporations are banding together and beating down the value of the tonnage of the United States. It has seemed to me that propaganda has been decrying and depreciating our Government's ship property for two whole years.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. I read a report in a newspaper on Sunday to the effect that the President and the leaders of the Republican Party had already agreed on a ship subsidy bill.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Yes. Let me comment on that. If that were true, and that subsidy bill were passed, these ships would perhaps bring a better price afterwards. But they are being offered for sale and bids are beginning to-day, to end on the 14th of March, before you can begin work on the subsidy bill. I will have something to say about subsidy later. It is up to this administration, it is up to Congress, it is up to the ingenuity of American statesmanship to show that they have some ability to handle a difficult question. In the Jones Act of 1920 we made provision that where there were desirable lines for our commerce to enter into, if we could not get private capital to buy the ships, we would try to charter the ships to run them on that line, and if we could not charter them to private capital, then the Government would run them itself. Now, it may be at a loss, at a sacrifice. But, in my opinion, if the policy of the Jones Act is followed out in that respect we will start the lines where there will be the greatest promise of success, and as we get a line in successful operation private capital will come and ask for the ships, and you will sell the ships as you get the opportunity to sell them at a fair value; and this great property belonging to the United States, instead of being thrown away, will result in opening up the commerce of the United States and result in the development of the merchant marine of the United States. I want our people to take an interest in it, to wake from their slumber, and I want to let the public know that this thing is about to be perpetrated, that this steal is about to be put through. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, if no gentleman desires to use any time I will ask that the Clerk read the bill for amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the time for making the allotments on the Crow Reservation, Mont., as provided by the act of June 4, 1920 (41 Stat. L., p. 751), be, and it is hereby, extended for a period of two years from December 4, 1921.

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to make or approve contracts with competent and experienced firms or individuals to prepare and submit, through the superintendent of the Five Civilized Tribes, amended income-tax returns covering previous years, for the restricted members of the Five Civilized Tribes of Indians in Oklahoma: Provided, That the compensation paid for the preparation and submission of such amended income-tax returns shall not exceed for any year 10 per cent of the actual net savings in taxes allowed such tax-paying Indians either by reason of deductions for depletion or other proper allowances actually secured in their behalf as a result of the work and efforts of the firms or individuals with whom such contract or contracts are made in pursuance of this act: Provided further, That the Secretary shall make payment of such compensation out of the funds belonging to the several restricted Indians who shall be the beneficiaries of such contract.

That nothing contained in the provisions of section 10 of the act of February 14, 1920 (41 Stat. L., p. 421), and of section 10 of the act of March 3, 1921 (41 Stat. L., p. 1237), shall be construed to preclude the payment of tuition for Indian children enrolled and educated in Montana State public schools, pursuant to annual or existing appropriations of public money for payment of such tuition.

That all of the provisions of an act entitled "An act for the relief of Indians occupying railroad lands in Arizona, New Mexico, or California," approved March 4, 1913, and amended by the act of April 11, 1916, and the act of June 30, 1919, be, and the same are hereby, extended to March 4, 1923: Provided, That the provisions of this act shall apply only in cases where it is shown that the lands were actually occupied in good faith by Indians prior to March 4, 1913, and the applicants are otherwise entitled to receive such tracts in allotment under existing law, but for the grant to the railroad company.

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to issue a patent in fee simple to the duly authorized missionary board, or other proper authority, of any religious organization engaged in mission or school work on any Indian reservation for such lands thereon as have been heretofore set apart to and are now being actually and beneficially used and occupied by such organization solely for mission or school purposes, the area so patented to not exceed 160 acres to any one organization at any station: Provided, That when no longer used for mission or school purposes said lands shall revert to the Indian owners.

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to withdraw from the fund in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Rosebud Sioux Tribe of Indians, known as the Sioux fund, Rosebud, created under the act of March 2, 1884 (23 Stats. L., p. 895), the sum of $30,000 for the purpose of establishing a revolving fund from which he may make loans to members of that tribe, under such rules and regulations as the said Secretary of the Interior may prescribe. Any loan so made is to stand as a preferred claim against any trust funds or trust lands under Government supervision which may belong to the borrower or his restricted estate from any source whatever.

That lands reserved for school and agency purposes and all other unallotted lands on the Fort Peck Reservation, Mont., reserved from allotment or other disposition, may be leased for mining purposes, with the approval of and under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

That there is hereby authorized an appropriation of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, from Rosebud tribal funds, for the erection of a monument, under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior, on the Rosebud Indian Reservation as a memorial to Indians of that tribe who gave their lives for their country in the recent war with Germany.

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to withdraw from the Treasury of the United States the sum of not to exceed $24,000 of any tribal funds on deposit to the credit of the Crow Indians, in the State of Montana, and to expend the same, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the acquiring of additional water rights for Indian allotments that are irrigable under the Two Legions Canal, but which have no water rights: Provided, That the amount to be paid for the acquiring of such water rights shall be not to exceed $20 per acre, and that said sum, or such part thereof as may be used for the purpose indicated, shall be reimbursed to the tribe under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

That wherever, in any law or treaty or in any patent issued to Indian allottees for lands in severalty pursuant to such law or treaty, there appears a provision to the effect that the lands so allotted can not be alienated without the consent of the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Interior shall have full power and authority to consent to or approve of the alienation of such allotments, in whole or in part, in his discretion, by deed, will, lease, or any other form of conveyance, and such consent or approval by the Secretary of the Interior heretofore or hereafter had in all such cases shall have the same force and legal effect as though the consent or approval of the President had previously been obtained: Provided, however, That the approval by the Secretary of the Interior of wills by Indian allottees or their heirs involving lands held under such patents shall not operate to remove the restrictions against alienation unless such order of approval by said Secretary shall specifically so direct.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph on page 4, commencing on line 3, and on the paragraph on page 5, commencing with line 3. I suppose the intention of the gentleman from New York is to strike out the paragraph beginning on page 2, line 22?

Mr. SNYDER. Yes. It is my intention to offer an amendment to the bill by striking out the language on page 2, beginning on line 22 and extending down to and including the language on page 3 to line 4; and then on page 4, beginning on line 16, strike out all down to line 20 and the language included in line 20; and then on page 5 to strike out, beginning with line 3, all the language on that page to and including line 15.

The reason for that is that on the 7th day of February those items were passed through this House as separate measures, so it is not necessary to include them here.

Mr. MANN. One of them is now a law.

Mr. SNYDER. Yes. I knew of no other way to correct this bill than to have those items stricken out at this time.

Mr. MANN. One of them is now a law and the other has passed both Houses.

Mr. SNYDER. Yes; but I knew of no other way to correct this bill except to ask to have this stricken out at this time.

Mr. MANN. I wonder if the gentleman has any suggestion about the point of order?

Mr. SNYDER. I do not understand what the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. MANN. This provides that the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to withdraw from the funds in the Treasury of the United States certain funds. Now, that is an appropriation.

Mr. SNYDER. That was not the intention. The intention here is simply to authorize the Committee on Appropriations to make that appropriation.

Mr. MANN. Down here in line 21, on page 4, is a provision that there is hereby authorized an appropriation of $5,000 from Rosebud tribal funds.

Mr. SNYDER. That is what the committee intended to do by the use of that language. There is no intention on the part of this Indian Affairs Committee to appropriate, because that committee knows that it has no authority to make appropriations. If the language is not correct I would be glad to have a suggestion of an amendment.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I do not know that I am specially anxious about the point of order, though I am not particularly enthusiastic about withdrawing Indian funds to loan the money; but I think this is an appropriation of that money in the Treasury. This is a direction to withdraw money now in the Treasury. Under the Constitution you can only withdraw money in the Treasury by virtue of an appropriation.

Mr. SNYDER. I have already stated to the gentleman that it was not the intention of this committee to attempt to appropriate; but after careful investigation and hearing it was determined that, since the Rosebud Indians had something like $300,000 in the Treasury, and many of the Indians were hard up and needed some money, after an act of their own council had been passed asking to have this money set aside, in order that they might loan it to their own Indians, it was thought advisable to give them an opportunity to do that. That is all this committee intended to do, and if we have done more than that I want to fix it so that we will do that and no more.

Mr. MANN. But I thought the intention of the committee was to get the money out of the Treasury?

Mr. SNYDER. I think the gentleman is absolutely right about that.

Mr. MANN. These were all special bills, introduced by a gentleman who probably was not very familiar with that particular rule of the House. He wanted to get the money out of the Treasury, and all he did in this bill was to collect the other bills and put them all together.

Mr. SNYDER. The hearings will show that it was distinctly stated, time and again, that we had no authority to appropriate, and we were simply attempting to authorize an appropriation.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, I thought I would call attention to it at least—

Mr. SNYDER. I am glad the gentleman did.

Mr. MANN. So that gentlemen in this committee might know that these things do not slip by without our knowing about it.

Mr. SNYDER. I want the gentleman to know that the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, at least, had no intention of letting anything slip by, and he ought to be fairly familiar with the fact that it is impossible to slip anything by, and he never would attempt to do it.

Mr. MANN. Well, if the item is to be in one shape or another I had just as lief it should be in this shape as any other as far as this item is concerned. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. WALSH. I renew the reservation of the point of order, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of asking the gentleman what the committee ascertained as to the necessity of creating a revolving fund for these Indians to have this money loaned to them, which very likely will never be repaid. What is the matter? Have they got tired of working, or are they destitute and suffering?

Mr. SNYDER. It is the rule on nearly all the reservations now, where they have money of their own, to create a revolving fund of this sort. I have never been heartily in favor of the proposition, but they insist on it, and they maintain that it is their own money and that if they want to loan it to their own people they ought to have the right to do so—

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. For old and indigent Indians.

Mr. SNYDER. For old and indigent Indians who have allotments which have not been realized on.

Mr. WALSH. Why not?

Mr. SNYDER. Because they have not found anybody to whom they can lease or sell them.

Mr. WALSH. Then it is only the old ones that have these allotments?

Mr. SNYDER. No; I think others have them also.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, this bill is intended to take care of old and indigent Indians living upon the Rosebud Indian Reservation. There are many of the Sioux Indians who are now between 70 and 80 years of age who have allotments but who are incompetent and to whom a patent, therefore, can not issue.

Mr. WALSH. Why does it not specify the kind of Indians that it is proposed to relieve? This is wide open to old or young, thrifty or improvident.

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman is right about that. No doubt it is the intention to loan this money to any Indian, whether he is young or old, for some purpose; but it is not the intention to loan it without some idea of a return of the money to the Indian fund.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman think it will be returned?

Mr. SNYDER. I think much of it will be. The experience with revolving funds is that much of the money is returned. The great difficulty is to get money returned which has been paid out from reimbursable funds that were created for the purpose of constructing irrigation systems and things like that.

Mr. WALSH. What is there about a revolving fund that attracts money back again, once it has been placed in the hands of these people?

Mr. SNYDER. Of course a revolving fund on a reservation is similar to a bank, only that it is a take-out bank and rarely does anybody put anything in. Arrangements are made with the superintendent for a loan, and the superintendent makes some arrangement with the Indians to pay that money back.

Mr. WALSH. I would like some explanation as to the necessity for this legislation. I would like to hear the gentleman from South Dakota, and I will reserve the point of order if the gentleman wants to make some explanation as to why this is so broad in its terms.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. As I started out to state before, there are on this reservation a large number of old and indigent Indians. This bill is intended to take care of those people. It permits the Secretary of the Interior to make loans to these old incompetent Indians who have allotments, or who have money coming to them from the Rosebud Sioux fund in the Treasury. Being wards of the Government they have no way by which they can obtain funds. Some are in a starving condition and have been kept alive only by assistance from friends. When this appropriation is authorized it will be available for the Secretary of the Interior from which to make loans to these old Indians, which loans become a first lien against their allotments or proceeds thereof when they shall be patented or sold and are also a lien against any trust fund under Government supervision they may have coming to them or that may accrue hereafter. There is no possibility of a dollar of this money being lost; it is bound to come back into the Indian fund.

Mr. SNYDER. The Secretary of the Interior after investigation wrote this letter. I will read a part of it:

The general council of the Rosebud Indians, at a meeting held on the 4th and 5th of April, 1921, unanimously adopted a resolution requesting that a sum of $30,000 be set aside from any applicable funds belonging to that tribe for the purpose of extending financial assistance to certain members of the tribe, particularly old Indians whose funds are exhausted and who are without means of providing themselves with the necessities of life. This resolution also suggested that any money so loaned to an Indian to stand as a preferred claim against his allotment or against any trust funds under Government supervision accruing to his credit at any subsequent time.

Mr. WALSH. The language in the bill does not confine it to the purpose set forth by the assistant secretary or the Indian Bureau, nor for the purpose stated by the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. There is this to be said—all this money will be loaned under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior. In going over this matter with the Secretary and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, they both said that it was their intention to loan money from this proposed fund to the Indians who have assets upon which they can not realize. The only way that this can be done is to provide a revolving fund from which the Secretary can make the loans.

Mr. WALSH. It ought to be confined to these indigent Indians.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Oh, well, we have other Indians; some are incompetent—

Mr. WALSH. We appropriated $350,000 for the relief of the Indians, and we made a $100,000 appropriation for them the other day.

Mr. MANN. That is out of the Federal Treasury, and we had better let them get it out of their own money than to take it out of the Treasury.

Mr. SNYDER. It is their own money. But I am as careful about spending their money as I would be spending that out of the Treasury.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but if the Indians have any property and they get any money it should be out of the Indian fund instead of out of the Treasury.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Is it not true that the young incompetent Indians have allotments and their money?

Mr. CARTER. And is not it also true that it is necessary for these young Indians to have a horse or a plow, and that that ought to be advanced by the Indian Bureau, and when that is done would not it be better to have it taken out of their own property than out of the Treasury?

Mr. RHODES. Will the gentleman permit me to assign an additional reason? The gentleman from Massachusetts has expressed a desire for reasons justifying this legislation. I have in mind a concrete case that is one of the strongest reasons I have ever seen for the justification of this particular legislation. I remember once having visited a certain ex-Indian chief of the Flathead Nation, a wonderful man, a man probably 90 years of age, who had both real and personal property in his own right. Yet this old man lived in a little cabin by himself, without any furniture scarcely, except one or two old broken-down chairs, a very few of the most simple household utensils, and I was informed that he was unable to make use of his own property, and was actually being maintained by charity in the neighborhood. It seems to me that such cases makes it absolutely necessary from a humanitarian standpoint, and from every other standpoint, that this legislation be enacted.

Mr. WALSH. Does this old man come under the provisions of this bill?

Mr. RHODES. This particular Indian would come under the provisions of this bill if the bill was applicable to his reservation. I submit that Congress should speedily enact such legislation applicable to every Indian tribe.

Mr. WALSH. We know that the longer a revolving fund is maintained the smaller it becomes, until it finally disappears.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri was the chairman of the subcommittee on Indian Affairs when that committee made an investigation of Indian affairs, which is now printed. He had charge of this particular part of this investigation—the revolving fund and reimbursements. He is as well versed on the question as any man on the Indian Affairs Committee, and I think he will bear me out in the statement that every Indian tribe should have a revolving fund out of which loans may be made for the purchase of harnesses, horses, cattle, plows, machinery, and things of that sort.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, what is the parliamentary situation?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order to the last paragraph of page 3 of the bill authorizing the disposition in fee simple of certain lands to certain religious organizations.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will not press that point.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the point of order?

Mr. BANKHEAD. This committee has no jurisdiction to report legislation of that character.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, that section is certainly not subject to the point of order. That sort of legislation has been enacted from time to time in this House for years by the Committee on Indian Affairs. The point about this question is this: There are now several sections of land on various reservations which have been allotted to various missionary societies, upon which they have built structures of great value, and the societies desire to go further with that work. They have no title to the property. The property has been set aside for them, and this is to give the bureau the right to give title to such of those as have already been allotted them in general, so that they will not have to come here every time they desire to set aside 160 acres for some particular purpose of this kind. In the visiting of the 25 reservations that this committee a year or two ago visited the best kept-up property and the best service we found in connection with the Indian Service anywhere was being conducted by these various missionary societies, without regard to their religious belief. It did not make any difference to what sect or belief they adhered, the work was being well done in all of them. I am heartily in favor of giving the bureau the right to set aside property for school and missionary purposes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I notice this proposes to give a title in fee simple.

Mr. SNYDER. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. A title in fee simple carries with it the absolute right to sell and dispose of the property.

Mr. SNYDER. Oh, no.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. How do you reconcile a title in fee simple with the proviso?

Mr. SNYDER. The bill distinctly provides that when no longer used for missionary or school purposes the land shall revert to the Indian owner. Of course, the property is set aside and the mission is conducted under rules and regulations laid down by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. A title in fee simple would allow the grantee to sell without limitation. A title in fee simple does not carry with it any restriction or limitation.

Mr. CARTER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield the floor?

Mr. SNYDER. Let us dispose of the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; I make the point of order.

Mr. SNYDER. What is the point of order?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That these are public lands of the United States, and that this committee has no jurisdiction to report legislation alienating title in fee simple to outside parties.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, this provision is strictly in accordance with the rules of the House and in accordance with the jurisdiction of this committee. If the gentleman will notice, the land to be transferred is land on Indian reservations where the lands are used for school or mission purposes. The lands on Indian reservations are Indian lands and are not public lands. Without saying anything with reference to the merits of the case, I do not think the point of order can be considered seriously, because there is not any implication even that these are public lands, and the Chair must take notice of the fact that the bill says lands on Indian reservations, which clearly defines the lands as Indian lands.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I want to state to the gentleman that the purpose of my making the point of order is that here is a proposition which involves the giving away, without any compensation, in fee simple, an undetermined amount of public lands of the United States.

Mr. CARTER. Oh, not to exceed 160 acres to anyone.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Not exceeding 160 acres; but how many of these associations are there that would be entitled under this bill to receive 160 acres of land, which might amount in the aggregate to a good many thousand acres of land? I want the gentleman to understand that I am not undertaking to criticize the work that is being done by these organizations. On the contrary, all of the evidence is that they are doing splendid work; but this involves a principle which I think is of sufficient gravity to at least have the matter discussed by raising the point of order, because it involves the absolute alienation in fee simple of an undetermined amount of public lands owned by the United States.

Mr. CARTER. The gentleman is discussing the merits. I am speaking of the parliamentary situation.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the point of order is not well taken, I do not care to discuss it, of course.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, may I call the attention of the gentleman from Alabama to the fact that one can not make a point of order to a legislative item in a public bill which has been referred to a committee and reported back to the House by that committee?

Mr. BANKHEAD. If that is true, the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. MANN. It is not well taken. The only way you can raise that question is by a motion in the House to refer the bill to some other committee.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I expect to refer that question to the presiding officer.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The gentleman from Illinois states correctly the rule and the uniform practice in this House, so far as the present occupant of the chair recalls, that after a bill has been considered by a committee and reported to the House and is under consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, the question of jurisdiction can not be raised. The Chair, therefore, overrules the point of order.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to say to the gentleman from New York that I can illustrate the point I made by citing a familiar example. Very often men by deed grant land to a village or town or city for the purpose of a park, with a right to use it unreservedly for that particular purpose, but with a provision in the deed that when the land ceases to be used for such specific purpose, then the title shall revert to the original donor; but a deed containing such reservation and limitation should never declare or pretend that it conveys to the grantee an absolute estate in fee simple, for it does nothing of the kind. Title in fee simple is a title without reservation. It includes an unrestricted right to transfer and sell. A patent in fee simple is an estate without limitation.

Mr. SNYDER. This would not be an absolute fee simple.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But in line 17, page 3, it provides for a "patent in fee simple," in direct contradiction of the proviso.

Mr. SNYDER. I think the gentleman from Wisconsin will admit it appears to be nothing more than an easement.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And yet, on page 3, line 17, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to issue a patent in fee simple. That would convey the whole title without any qualification or reservation.

Mr. CARTER. For certain purposes, to be used for schools and missions.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Then strike out the words "fee simple." There is a direct contradiction in terms as the language now stands. You do not, you can not, give a person a title in fee simple if in the same sentence you provide that the land must be used for certain purposes only, and that when no longer so used the title shall revert to the grantor. You can give the right to use this land for the purposes of a school a thousand years if you choose, and with the reservation that it shall go to the donor or his heirs in the event it ceases to be used for that specific purpose. But do not use the words "fee simple."

Mr. CARTER. If the gentleman will permit, evidently the Committee on Indian Affairs intended to do that which the gentleman from Wisconsin is in favor of doing.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Then strike out the words "fee simple."

Mr. MANN. Well, the term "fee simple" originally was used in contradistinction of the entailed estates. We have always used it in this country where we have no entailed estates, but that is where the term came from and the meaning. We can pass title by fee simple with all sorts of reservations in if we wish. I have drawn deeds that way repeatedly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It was a mistake if the gentleman did it.

Mr. MANN. It may be a mistake, but after all—

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Absolutely.

Mr. MANN. The great title conveyancers of the country and the greatest guarantors of real estate in the country do it, notwithstanding the opinion of my friend from Wisconsin.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Let me say to my friend from Illinois that you do not give a man a title in fee simple when you provide that if the land be used for other than a specified purpose the title shall revert to the grantor and his heirs.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GENSMAN. Mr. Chairman, I am in full accord with the law as laid down by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. I believe that the language of the bill amply protects the Government in every respect in that it states that wherever the land being used is ever used for other purposes than those intended by the bill then the same reverts to the Government.

In any event the Government is protected, and I feel that it is up to us to encourage these institutions in every way possible.

I live within a few miles of two Indian churches. I do not know what the condition of the title to the land is; whether it is in the organization, corporation, institution, conducting services upon the premises. For instance, one of these institutions is run by Brother Deyo, an old-time Indian missionary, who is beyond question the true and tried friend of the Indian. When I came to that country and it was all a prairie, few white men were in the Kiowa and Comanche country. Brother Deyo had his church or mission out west of the newly established town. Indians attended faithfully at his meetings and had been doing so for a number of years. If there is any man in the Kiowa and Comanche country who has earned 160 acres, it certainly is he. To the north of my home town is an Indian mission. Rev. Harper, an Indian missionary, has been there for a number of years. His work among the Indians is apparent.

I am a great believer in this form of helping the Indian, and I feel that we can not do too much to encourage them, and whether the point of order made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] is good or not, from the standpoint of merit these missionaries are entitled to every consideration and encouragement.

Mr. CLOUSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GENSMAN. I will.

Mr. CLOUSE. Of course, I understand that the gentleman from Oklahoma is intensely interested in the welfare of the Indians, and having that view of the case I was just wondering what he thought about this provision authorizing the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, to make contracts with experienced firms or individuals to go into the question of reviewing their income tax returns back to the year 1914 and charge a per cent.

Mr. SNYDER. We will come to that a little later on.

Mr. CLOUSE. I desire to know now, if I can get the information, what the object and purpose of that is when you have a superintendent whose duty it should be to look after the welfare of those Indians?

Mr. SNYDER. If the gentleman will permit, we will get to that in just a minute.

Mr. GENSMAN. I will answer the question propounded by the gentleman from Tennessee by saying that I have not looked into the matter very carefully, but that the superintendent of an ordinary Indian agency has all he can do to take care of the Indians without going into the question of the Indians' tax reports. What I am more particularly interested in is these missionaries on the reservation, who have lived there for years and years and who have done their part to raise the standards of the Indian and make him able to cope with the white man. These missionaries do their work with a feeling of love for humanity and a desire to serve their God. Their work is usually performed under trying circumstances and more or less unpleasant surroundings. The Indian is losing nothing and gaining a great deal, and I certainly hope the point of order will be withdrawn.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the bill by striking out, on page 2, beginning with line 22, all the language down to and including line 4, on page 3.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SNYDER: Page 2, line 22, strike out all of lines 22, 23, 24, and 25, and all of lines 1, 2, 3, and 4 on page 3.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I invite the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. GENSMAN], who a few moments ago promptly approved his interpretation of the law, that according to Bouvier's Law Dictionary, a standard authority, both gentlemen are absolutely mistaken. I thought it was strange if I had forgotten the definition, given from Blackstone down, of the words fee simple. I read from Bouvier:

Fee simple: An estate of inheritance. The word simple adds no meaning to the word fee standing by itself. But it excludes all qualification or restriction as to the persons who may inherit it as heirs—

I direct the attention of the gentleman from Oklahoma—

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is, if they inherit it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Please wait a minute.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It provides a deed in fee simple.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. This bill, as drawn, does not.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. A patent in fee simple.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Bouvier, in defining fee simple, says:

It excludes all qualification or restriction as to the persons who may inherit it as heirs, thus distinguishing it from a fee tail, as well as from an estate which though inheritable, is subject to conditions or collateral determination.

It is the largest possible estate which a man can have, being an absolute estate in perpetuity. It is where lands are given to a man and to his heirs absolutely, without any end or limitation put to the estate.

Note that language. Fee simple is "the largest possible estate which a man can have. It is where lands are given to a man and to his heirs absolutely without any end or limitation on the estate." But the proviso beginning on line 25, page 3, puts a very strong limitation in the deed, and, therefore, a deed containing such limitation would not convey a title in fee simple.

Now, this is in a certain sense not a very important matter, and yet when men arise and take it as a matter of course that you are mistaken, when you know that you are right, it is well, when possible, to bring in authority to demonstrate that your interpretation of the law is correct. And therefore I again read Bouvier's definition of an estate in fee simple:

It is where lands are given to a man and to his heirs absolutely, without any end or limitation put to the estate.

Mark that language, "to a man and his heirs absolutely," "without limitation."

But this proviso imposes a limitation. It restricts the authority of the grantee. It provides not for a title in fee simple, but for a restricted fee. And therefore, as I have said, it is a contradiction in terms to say in one line that you give to John Smith a title in fee simple, which is an absolute title without qualification or limitation, and follow that up with the statement that if the land is not used for school purposes it shall go back to you and your heirs.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman contend that the authority he has cited proves that his contention is right?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Of course I do. Otherwise, Mr. Chairman, I should not have read it. And I also mean what I say when I say that Bouvier defines a title in fee simple as an absolute estate without limitation.

Mr. WALSH. The dictionary corroborates the position of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I wanted to kindly come to the aid of the gentleman from Wisconsin and simply call his attention to the rule in Shelley's case, which is where an estate is created by gift or conveyance, and in the same instrument an estate is limited to the heirs of the grantee, the word heir or heirs shall be construed as words of limitation and not of purchase, but this rule having been abrogated by statute in this country leaves the converse to be the rule.

But I am not interested in that, but am interested in another feature of the bill. Now, under the language used on page 2, beginning with line 4, it seems that down in the good old State of Oklahoma there is some one that needs a job, and if that be true there is a provision in this bill that is going to take care of him very well, I think. The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to make and approve contracts with experienced firms or individuals to go over and review and revise the income tax returns of this tribe of Indians since the year 1914.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLOUSE. In just a minute.

I happen to know a little something about figures, and I know how a man's memory operates, too, and if you open up this avenue to permit some expert accountant to go down there, with the incentive that he is to get 5 per cent on every dollar that he can fish out of the Government of the United States in revising these returns, I imagine when you grant the authority and he gets on the job that the Treasury of the United States is going to suffer immensely as a result of it. Why go down there and revise estimates, and insist upon deductions that probably were made at the proper time and at the time the returns were made, seven years or eight years ago, when time has destroyed the records that would be worth anything or that could be looked to or considered as evidence as to the justice of these claims? Now, I just wanted to know what the superintendent, who is supposed to be looking after the interests of these Indians, has been doing if he did not make the income-tax returns for this tribe of Indians, who are the wards of the Government, at the proper time and in the proper way?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote on the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I move to further amend, on page 4, beginning on line 16, by striking out the language down to and including the language in line 20 on the same page.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SNYDER: Page 4, beginning with line 16, strike out all of lines 16, 17, 18, 19, and 20.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment: On page 5, beginning with line 3, strike out all the language down to and including the language in line 15 of the same page.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SNYDER: On page 5, beginning with line 3, strike out all the language down to and including the language in line 15 of the same page.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Utah offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LEATHERWOOD: Page 2, line 8, after the word "returns," strike out the words "covering previous years" and insert in lieu thereof the words "to and including the year 1921."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have heard the amendment read. What does it mean?

Mr. CLOUSE. It means to go back to 1913.

Mr. SNYDER. It means this, that after this bill was presented here to-day, after further study, some of the members of the committee were in doubt as to whether the words "previous years" would not permit a case occurring, say, this year, which would be considered as a previous year if the matter were not presented until next year; and in the desire to fix it so that the report could not go back further than the previous year we put this language in.

Mr. MANN. It goes back under the language of the bill and according to the amendment as far as 1913.

Mr. SNYDER. This prevents going, in the future, further back than 1921.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Utah is recognized in favor of his amendment.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, it was clearly the intention of the committee to limit these contracts simply to returns already on file. It was not the intention of the committee to recommend legislation with the idea that there would be incorrect tax returns filed for these Indians in the future.

Mr. MANN. There will be, will there not?

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. We do not propose, if we enact this legislation, to make it possible that the attorneys shall be constantly clamoring in the future that the Indian Bureau shall make this class of contract. The superintendent of the Five Civilized Tribes should file correct income-tax returns for these Indians from now on. It is with some reluctance that I am led to think that this bill should be passed. I think there is much force in what the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CLOUSE] has said with reference to this particular question. I have very little doubt but that if you pass legislation of this character, leaving the time open, you will put a premium upon an attempt, every time a lot of income-tax reports are filed for these Indians, to have them revised by attorneys holding contracts calling for commission for their services.

Mr. SNYDER. Of course the gentleman understands that the situation as it exists to-day is this: Certain restricted Indians in Oklahoma have had returns made for them by the superintendents of these various tribes—returns that are proven already to have been incorrect—and they have no means except through the bureau to make an effort to get a revision of those returns. The Indian Bureau takes the position that it has no lawyers or no experts that it can put upon these cases to determine what the Indian is entitled to have returned to him.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. It is just for that reason that I am in favor of enacting this particular legislation, but limiting it so that it will apply only to returns filed prior to and including the year 1921. There is no question but there have been incorrect returns filed involving perhaps as much as $350,000. I have no objection to this legislation, but I do not want it to go further.

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman would stop it at this point, so that it can not go further than 1921?

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. What years do you want examined?

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. I assume, and I understand it is the intention of the committee, that the returns filed since 1913 up to 1921 will be examined for the purpose of correction.

Mr. MANN. There is a statute of limitations against opening up the accounts.

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman understands that recently, within a year, everybody who made an income-tax return was asked to waive that statutory right, so that the inspectors of the income department can go on and inspect your returns even though the statute of limitations has barred it.

Mr. MANN. They do not pretend to go back to 1913 or 1914. They can not go back that far and open up those returns.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. Then it would include only those that accrued prior to 1921 and that are not barred by the statute.

Mr. WALSH. Why not specify the years, 1918, 1919, 1920, and 1921? Why should they not be specifically mentioned?

Mr. MANN. If you can go back beyond the statute of limitations, it will open them up.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. The object I have in view is to put a stop to it as to all reports filed as to income received after 1921.

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized.

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Utah [Mr. LEATHERWOOD], in my judgment, repeals all existing law upon this question and especially with respect to the statute of limitations, because of the fact that it is a subsequent statute, directly in conflict with the provisions of existing law and therefore operates as a repeal by implication of all laws inconsistent therewith.

Now, here is the proposition that I have in mind: Here is a proposition, a contract, made with an expert income-tax authority or an accountant to go out in Oklahoma and revise the returns of this tribe of Indians, his compensation depending solely upon the amount that he can have the income tax reduced for a certain year. Every incentive is offered to induce him to falsify his figures, because his compensation depends upon his success in reducing the amount paid. Now, if we repeal the act for this tribe of Indians and permit them to go back to 1913—

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion?

Mr. CLOUSE. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. This does not deal with a tribe of Indians. This simply deals with a few restricted Indians who have sufficient incomes to pay an income tax.

Mr. CLOUSE. Oh, yes; I understand the class of Indians it deals with, but if you are going to take the bars down to a class of restricted Indians, why do you not take them down to the thousands of American citizens who are white men who have made mistakes in their income-tax returns and paid the Government more than they were justly obligated to pay?

Mr. SNYDER. These are restricted Indians, who can not of their own accord go out and get somebody to do it.

Mr. CLOUSE. But the Government is paying a superintendent for those restricted Indians, and it is his duty to look after them; and if he had been doing his duty he would have seen to it that their returns were properly made.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman permit me to make another suggestion there?

Mr. CLOUSE. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. It was impossible for the superintendent to do that, because it was impossible for him to figure the depletion in the property at the time the income-tax returns were made, so the returns must be gone over afterwards.

Mr. CLOUSE. But the record discloses, in my judgment, that he followed literally the provisions of the income tax law, for he says that his office has computed the taxes on the basis of the actual decrease in production for each current year. What other method is there for arriving at the return?

Mr. BURTNESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLOUSE. Yes.

Mr. BURTNESS. Does not the gentleman see that that allowance has not been granted by the department?

Mr. CLOUSE. Yes; and under the law it should not be allowed.

Mr. BURTNESS. Does the gentleman contend that there should not be a proper allowance made for depletion, and just because the Indian agent did not know what the depletion was, and did not give the Indian the benefit of what he should be allowed, that for that reason there should be no allowance for depletion?

Mr. CLOUSE. I know that under the income tax law he may charge off such an amount as is necessary to keep the property in repair, but depletion does not relate to income, and I say if an honest expert accountant was there he could not change the result in this case, because that is the ruling of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. SNYDER. Evidently the gentleman is not familiar with the method in which they handle the income tax out there, because they do deduct for depletion.

Mr. CLOUSE. I do not know of any section of the income tax law which authorizes it.

Mr. SNYDER. This matter has been about as carefully investigated as it is possible to investigate any matter.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. My genial friend from Tennessee [Mr. CLOUSE] says that evidently somebody down in Oklahoma wants a job. If this bill becomes a law, as I hope it will, probably somebody will receive a job. It will be necessary to appoint some one to check up these income-tax returns of the restricted Indians, and I assume it will be some worthy Republican under this administration.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman knows this is for the benefit of ex-Senator Gore. What is the use of beating around the bush?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, ex-Senator Gore is a lawyer. The thing necessary to be done here is to have an expert on depletion who is an engineer. It will take an engineer to do this work. A lawyer can not do it, and I think Senator Gore so stated before the committee if I recall correctly.

Mr. MANN. Ex-Senator Gore is the only man who has been here advocating the bill. I do not say it is an improper bill.

Mr. CARTER. I say to the gentleman from Illinois that several other gentlemen have been to me about the bill, and there were several other gentlemen before the committee. Of course, what I said with reference to the appointment of a good Republican was a facetious remark in reply to what the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Clouse] had said. I assume, however, that it will be a Republican. If this was a Democratic administration, I should certainly insist on the appointee being a Democrat.

Mr. MANN. It will be a great disappointment to ex-Senator Gore if the appointee is a Republican.

Mr. CLOUSE. I would like to have the gentleman from Oklahoma point out just what section of the income tax law would authorize a deduction for depletion in the value of property?

Mr. CARTER. I think I can do that if the gentleman will indulge me for a moment.

Mr. CLOUSE. I would be glad to have the gentleman do it.

Mr. CARTER. I thought I had the citation here. I can put it in the Record if the gentleman would like to see it.

I think about February 17, 1919, they began allowing a charge for depletion in the income-tax returns on oil. There is no one who can figure this depletion but a mining engineer. Every big oil company in the country has an engineer to figure the depletion for them. They had a man doing the very same service for them that is asked for by these Indians.

Mr. CLOUSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. CLOUSE. Suppose one of these engineers goes from here and finds in 1913 the depletion on a particular tract of land was $200,000. How is the Government going to controvert and take issue with the findings of that engineer?

Mr. CARTER. We all know that the Internal Revenue Department of the Government is taking care of the collection of internal revenue pretty well.

Mr. CLOUSE. Yes; and they are trying to be fair with the taxpayers as well as with the Government and with these Indians.

Mr. CARTER. The Indians have not been taken care of because they have had no one to figure the depletion. The superintendent of the Indians went to the Government to get the depletion records of the oil producers, but he could not have access to them. The experts in the Indian Bureau, according to the statements of the Indian Commissioner and according to the statement of the superintendent himself, can not figure this depletion. It will take such men as they have not in the service and such men as are employed now by very big oil companies of the country. So the Indian has gone along, getting no credit for depletion where the white man has been getting his.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The depletion that is claimed by a man who returns his income is to be passed upon by the Government.

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. If an Indian employs an engineer who figures a great depletion, who is going to determine whether it is correct?

Mr. CARTER. Oh, the gentleman from Illinois saw that in a moment, and the gentleman from Tennessee must have seen that.

Mr. MANN. That does not answer the question.

Mr. CARTER. What I mean is that the gentleman saw that the Government would have the last word on the proposition of depletion.

Mr. MANN. Does the Government act without any knowledge or take the say so of somebody else?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I assume and I think it may be presumed that the Government does not do business that way.

Mr. MANN. That is what I presume, that it does not do business that way, and therefore I can see no earthly reason for hiring an expensive engineer to figure out the depletion.

Mr. CARTER. There is no depletion figures on Indian property because there has been no way of figuring it. There has been nobody to do it. The oil company has an engineer to figure out the depletion, but these records are not accessible to the superintendent, and therefore he has no way of figuring it and the Indian has not got the benefit of it.

Mr. MANN. In the end the Government is to figure the depletion on a certain basis, here or elsewhere, and it does not depend on the individual opinion of some engineer who says that the depletion at this well is so much and at that well so much.

Mr. CARTER. Oh, yes; it does depend on the situation; the depletion is figured differently at different wells; no two wells have the same depletion. Some wells are exhausted much sooner than others.

Mr. BURTNESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Mr. BURTNESS. In other words, the amount of depletion that an engineer of the department allows in each particular case depends solely on the evidence that is submitted to the department in connection with the return.

Mr. CARTER. It depends solely on the exhaustion of the oil in each particular case.

Mr. BURTNESS. But the department does not know anything about the exhaustion in the absence of evidence offered to it.

Mr. SNYDER. What happens is that the estimate of depletion laid down by the engineer is the basis of each adjustment that is made. The Government does not have to take the engineer's say so.

Mr. CARTER. Certainly not, the department will have the right to revise it. This bill is representing the taxpayer, and allows him to employ an engineer the same as the corporation.

Mr. SNYDER. As a matter of fact, returns have been made in which depletion has not been figured, and the Indian has no power and no authority to employ somebody to correct his return. Therefore, by this legislation we are simply giving the bureau the right to select an attorney to see that the return is revised, and if the Indian has anything due him he is to get it back. We did not bring this bill in as it was originally planned to do, giving the attorney 5 per cent on all of the money collected.

Mr. MANN. I am not so sure.

Mr. SNYDER. We have brought in a bill giving him 10 per cent of the actual tax he recovers.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the principle of letting the Indians have a fair show, but I would like to ask about what was a committee amendment on the Senate bill, and what is a part of the text in this bill. The Senate passed this bill providing that the commissions should not exceed 5 per cent of the allowances secured in behalf of such Indians as the result of the contract.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has again expired.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. The allowances that are actually secured are the reductions, so far as I can understand, of the taxes to be paid.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, I believe I can answer that question. I had something to do with drawing the proposed amendment to the Senate joint resolution as it was introduced, and I think the gentleman from Illinois has misunderstood or has misread the language of the Senate bill.

Mr. MANN. I have not misread it. I may have misunderstood it.

Mr. BURTNESS. The original Senate bill provided that the compensation should not exceed 5 per cent of the depletion allowed. This bill provides that the compensation shall not exceed 10 per cent of the actual net savings in taxes allowed. The situation is plain, that 5 per cent of the depletion allowed in most cases would be very much more than 10 per cent of the actual net saving allowed. A person may be allowed $1,000 in depletion, reducing by that amount the net income upon which he must pay a tax. That, however, may not save him more than 4 per cent of the thousand dollars, or $40, in so far as the taxes are concerned. The amount saved would depend upon the specific normal and surtax applicable to his case. If the Senate bill as originally introduced and as it was passed by the Senate should have been approved by the House, then 5 per cent would have been figured on the entire allowance of depletion deducted, which often would be many times as much as 10 per cent on the actual saving. Take a case to illustrate, where the return of the Indian in the first place is $15,000. He is allowed a depletion of $10,000, making his net income $5,000. There would be a saving in depletion of $10,000. Five per cent of that amount would mean $500, while, as a matter of fact, if you figure out the saving, that would be graduated, starting out with the first thousand dollars saved above $5,000. If he is a single man with an exemption of $1,000, the sum from $5,000 to $6,000 would be subject to 9 per cent, 8 per cent normal and 1 per cent surtax; from $6,000 to $8,000 10 per cent, and so on, graduated depending on the amount of the surtax applicable. I think I have the exact figures here in just that sort of a case. Ten per cent on the savings in such a hypothetical case would amount to $115, 10 per cent of a net saving of $1,150, while 5 per cent on the depletion would amount to $500; and that is why I suggested, somewhat inadvertently, a few moments ago that I felt the gentleman from Illinois did not gather the full import of the language used in the Senate bill. I have a copy of the Senate bill here.

Mr. MANN. So have I, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER] had explained this in part to me before, but I did not take time to understand it at the time and asked them to explain it when we reached it on the floor.

Mr. SNYDER. I intended to do that, but the gentleman from North Dakota is a member of the subcommittee that worked out these figures.

Mr. MANN. As far as I am concerned I am satisfied with that explanation.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I just want to answer one question the gentleman from Tennessee asked. He asked why there is any more reason to do this for the Indian than there is for the white man. The reason is twofold. First, this is being done with the Indians' own funds, it being done by paying a percentage of that amount which is recovered. Second, the Indian is the ward of the Government. He is incapable of doing business himself. Last year 242 Indians in Oklahoma paid more than $350,000 income tax. They have no way to have those matters adjusted or corrected unless this bill is passed, and the United States Government can not in good conscience refuse to protect them, since they are the wards of the Government.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I move a substitute to the Leatherwood amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment by way of substitute to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Utah, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute offered by Mr. SNYDER: Page 2, line 9, strike out "previous," at the beginning of line 9, and insert "the," and after the word "years" insert the figures "1919, 1920, and 1921."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The amendment to the amendment in the nature of a substitute was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment as amended by the substitute.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk amend the bill by inserting section numbers in front of all of the different paragraphs of the bill after the first paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the Clerk number the paragraphs of the bill as sections. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BANKHEAD: Page 3, line 25, after the word "provided," insert "such patent shall provide," and in line 17 strike out the words "in fee simple."

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, so far as the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs is concerned and other members of that committee he has spoken to, we have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad the gentleman accepts the amendment. The only purpose I have in offering it is to clear up a proposition that might arise with reference to the title in these lands. I understand the purpose of the committee was only to give an easement in perpetuity to these organizations so long as they used the land for school purposes.

Mr. SNYDER. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 10193, had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the title to conform with the changes made.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SNYDER. I move that the bills H. R. 9383 and 10073 be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. SNYDER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

GOVERNMENT-OWNED RADIO STATIONS.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I desire to take from the Speaker's table House joint resolution No. 7, returned from the Senate with certain amendments made by that body, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the joint resolution by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution No. 7, a joint resolution to amend section 2 of the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution to authorize the operation of Government-owned radio stations for the use of the general public, and for other purposes, approved June 5, 1920."

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Is that a privileged matter?

The SPEAKER. It is not; it is a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. GARNER. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether or not he has consulted with the minority Members and has their consent for this action?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I have; and they have agreed to it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the conferees.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts, Mr. WHITE of Maine, Mr. CHINDBLOM, Mr. LAZARO, and Mr. BANKHEAD.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD an address delivered by Hon. B. B. Cohoon, sr., of Fredericktown, Mo., on the life and character of Judge William Carter, deceased, before the bench and bar of Bollinger County, late judge of the twentieth judicial circuit of Missouri.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the address referred to. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I do not think we ought to start in the practice of printing speeches made by distinguished gentlemen outside of the House upon the life and character of other distinguished gentlemen, and for the present I object.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to—

Mr. ROBERT E. EVANS, for two days, on account of important business.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bills and joint resolution of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 3046. An act to donate the gates at the head of West Executive Avenue, in the city of Washington, D. C., to the Hayes Memorial Museum, Fremont, Ohio; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

S. 1502. An act for the relief of Thomas E. Owen; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 1670. An act for the relief of Buffkin & Girvin; to the Committee on War Claims.

S. 2765. An act for the relief of the Fidelity & Deposit Co. of Maryland, Baltimore, Md.; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 2745. An act to amend subdivision (3) of subsection (B) of section 9 of an act entitled "An act to define, regulate, and punish trading with the enemy, and for other purposes," approved October 6, 1917, as amended; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 1784. An act for the relief of John B. Elliott; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 2095. An act to reimburse the city of Baltimore, State of Maryland, for moneys expended to aid the United States in the construction of works of defense during the Civil War; to the Committee on War Claims.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bills:

H. R. 77. An act for the consolidation of forest lands within the Clearwater, St. Joe, and Selway National Forests;

H. R. 5659. An act for the relief of Ellen M. Willey, widow of Owen S. Willey;

H. R. 9386. An act to grant the consent of Congress to the Whiteville Lumber Co. to construct a bridge across the Waccamaw River at or near Pireway Ferry, County of Columbus, N. C.;

H. R. 8818. An act granting the consent of Congress to the city of Pittsburgh, a municipal corporation of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Monongahela River at or near its junction with the Allegheny River in the city of Pittsburgh, in the county of Allegheny, in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania; and

H. R. 10009. An act to authorize the State of Alabama through its highway department to construct and maintain a bridge across the Tombigbee River at or near Moscow Landing, in the State of Alabama.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 11 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 22, 1922, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 22, 1922.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. J. Muir, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father and our God, the God of our fathers, we bless Thee to-day for such a noble heritage. We think of the men who had to do with the formation of our country, giving to it character at its very beginning and bringing to us so much of the richness of thought, of high and holy incentive in lines of duty and of responsibility.

We thank Thee for him who in our thought we love to call the Father of our Country. We thank Thee for his devotion to high ideals, for the splendor of his patriotism, and for the genius that gave character to his statesmanship. We do ask that we may never be faulty in connection with our devotion to him, and that our regard for the principles that were dear to him may be handed down to the latest ages.

The Lord, our God, keep us from all the follies that have saddened the lives and the histories of other lands. God grant to us constantly the evidence of Thy presence, and give unto us, we ask, always and under every circumstance the assurance that Thou art our God and shall be our guide even unto the end. We ask in Jesus Christ's name. Amen.

The VICE PRESIDENT being absent, the President pro tempore [Mr. CUMMINS] took the chair.

On request of Mr. LODGE, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Monday, February 20, 1922, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

READING OF WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In compliance with an order of the Senate, the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] will now read Washington's Farewell Address.

Mr. POINDEXTER read the address, as follows:

To the people of the United States.

FRIENDS AND FELLOW CITIZENS: The period for a new election of a citizen to administer the executive government of the United States being not far distant, and the time actually arrived when your thoughts must be employed in designating the person who is to be clothed with that important trust, it appears to me proper, especially as it may conduce to a more distinct expression of the public voice, that I should now apprise you of the resolution I have formed, to decline being considered among the number of those, out of whom a choice is to be made.

I beg you, at the same time, to do me the justice to be assured that this resolution has not been taken without a strict regard to all the considerations appertaining to the relation which binds a dutiful citizen to his country; and that, in withdrawing the tender of service which silence in my situation might imply, I am influenced by no diminution of zeal for your future interest; no deficiency of grateful respect for your past kindness; but am supported by a full conviction that the step is compatible with both.

The acceptance of, and continuance hitherto in the office to which your suffrages have twice called me, have been a uniform sacrifice of inclination to the opinion of duty, and to a deference for what appeared to be your desire. I constantly hoped that it would have been much earlier in my power, consistently with motives which I was not at liberty to disregard, to return to that retirement from which I had been reluctantly drawn. The strength of my inclination to do this previous to the last election had even led to the preparation of an address to declare it to you; but mature reflection on the then perplexed and critical posture of our affairs with foreign nations and the unanimous advice of persons entitled to my confidence, impelled me to abandon the idea.

I rejoice that the state of your concerns, external as well as internal, no longer renders the pursuit of inclination incompatible with the sentiment of duty or propriety; and am persuaded, whatever partiality may be retained for my services, that in the present circumstances of our country you will not disapprove my determination to retire.

The impressions with which I first undertook the arduous trust were explained on the proper occasion. In the discharge of this trust I will only say that I have, with good intentions, contributed towards the organization and administration of the government, the best exertions of which a very fallible judgment was capable. Not unconscious in the outset, of the inferiority of my qualifications, experience, in my own eyes, perhaps still more in the eyes of others, has strengthened the motives to diffidence of myself; and, every day, the increasing weight of years admonishes me more and more that the shade of retirement is as necessary to me as it will be welcome. Satisfied that if any circumstances have given peculiar value to my services they were temporary, I have the consolation to believe that, while choice and prudence invite me to quit the political scene, patriotism does not forbid it.

In looking forward to the moment which is to terminate the career of my political life, my feelings do not permit me to suspend the deep acknowledgment of that debt of gratitude which I owe to my beloved country, for the many honors it has conferred upon me; still more for the steadfast confidence with which it has supported me; and for the opportunities I have thence enjoyed of manifesting my inviolable attachment, by services faithful and persevering, though in usefulness unequal to my zeal. If benefits have resulted to our country from these services, let it always be remembered to your praise, and as an instructive example in our annals, that under circumstances in which the passions, agitated in every direction, were liable to mislead amidst appearances sometimes dubious, vicissitudes of fortune often discouraging—in situations in which not unfrequently, want of success has countenanced the spirit of criticism,—the constancy of your support was the essential prop of the efforts, and a guarantee of the plans, by which they were effected. Profoundly penetrated with this idea, I shall carry it with me to my grave, as a strong incitement to unceasing vows that heaven may continue to you the choicest tokens of its beneficence—that your union and brotherly affection may be perpetual—that the free constitution, which is the work of your hands, may be sacredly maintained—that its administration in every department may be stamped with wisdom and virtue—that, in fine, the happiness of the people of these states, under the auspices of liberty, may be made complete by so careful a preservation, and so prudent a use of this blessing, as will acquire to them the glory of recommending it to the applause, the affection and adoption of every nation which is yet a stranger to it.

Here, perhaps, I ought to stop. But a solicitude for your welfare, which cannot end but with my life, and the apprehension of danger, natural to that solicitude, urge me, on an occasion like the present, to offer to your solemn contemplation, and to recommend to your frequent review, some sentiments which are the result of much reflection, of no inconsiderable observation, and which appear to me all important to the permanency of your felicity as a people. These will be offered to you with the more freedom, as you can only see in them the disinterested warnings of a parting friend, who can possibly have no personal motive to bias his counsel. Nor can I forget as an encouragement to it, your indulgent reception of my sentiments on a former and not dissimilar occasion.

Interwoven as is the love of liberty with every ligament of your hearts, no recommendation of mine is necessary to fortify or confirm the attachment.

The unity of government which constitutes you one people, is also now dear to you. It is justly so; for it is a main pillar in the edifice of your real independence; the support of your tranquillity at home; your peace abroad; of your safety; of your prosperity; of that very liberty which you so highly prize. But, as it is easy to foresee that, from different causes and from different quarters much pains will be taken, many artifices employed, to weaken in your minds the conviction of this truth; as this is the point in your political fortress against which the batteries of internal and external enemies will be most constantly and actively (though often covertly and insidiously) directed; it is of infinite moment, that you should properly estimate the immense value of your national union to your collective and individual happiness; that you should cherish a cordial, habitual, and immovable attachment to it; accustoming yourselves to think and speak of it as of the palladium of your political safety and prosperity; watching for its preservation with jealous anxiety; discountenancing whatever may suggest even a suspicion that it can, in any event, be abandoned; and indignantly frowning upon the first dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest, or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts.

For this you have every inducement of sympathy and interest. Citizens by birth, or choice, of a common country, that country has a right to concentrate your affections. The name of American, which belongs to you in your national capacity, must always exalt the just pride of patriotism, more than any appellation derived from local discriminations. With slight shades of difference, you have the same religion, manners, habits, and political principles. You have, in a common cause, fought and triumphed together; the independence and liberty you possess, are the work of joint counsels, and joint efforts, of common dangers, sufferings and successes.

But these considerations, however powerfully they address themselves to your sensibility, are greatly outweighed by those which apply more immediately to your interest.—Here, every portion of our country finds the most commanding motives for carefully guarding and preserving the union of the whole.

The north, in an unrestrained intercourse with the south, protected by the equal laws of a common government, finds in the productions of the latter, great additional resources of maritime and commercial enterprise, and precious materials of manufacturing industry.—The south, in the same intercourse benefiting by the same agency of the north, sees its agriculture grow and its commerce expanded. Turning partly into its own channels the seamen of the north, it finds its particular navigation invigorated; and while it contributes, in different ways, to nourish and increase the general mass of the national navigation, it looks forward to the protection of a maritime strength, to which itself is unequally adapted. The east, in a like intercourse with the west, already finds, and in the progressive improvement of interior communications by land and water, will more and more find a valuable vent for the commodities which it brings from abroad, or manufactures at home. The west derives from the east supplies requisite to its growth and comfort—and what is perhaps of still greater consequence, it must of necessity owe the secure enjoyment of indispensable outlets for its own productions, to the weight, influence, and the future maritime strength of the Atlantic side of the Union, directed by an indissoluble community of interest as one nation. Any other tenure by which the west can hold this essential advantage, whether derived from its own separate strength; or from an apostate and unnatural connection with any foreign power, must be intrinsically precarious.

While then every part of our country thus feels an immediate and particular interest in union, all the parts combined cannot fail to find in the united mass of means and efforts, greater strength, greater resource, proportionably greater security from external danger, a less frequent interruption of their peace by foreign nations; and, what is of inestimable value, they must derive from union, an exemption from those broils and wars between themselves, which so frequently afflict neighboring countries not tied together by the same government; which their own rivalry alone would be sufficient to produce, but which opposite foreign alliances, attachments, and intrigues, would stimulate and embitter.—Hence likewise, they will avoid the necessity of those overgrown military establishments, which under any form of government are inauspicious to liberty, and which are to be regarded as particularly hostile to republican liberty. In this sense it is, that your union ought to be considered as a main prop of your liberty, and that the love of the one ought to endear to you the preservation of the other.

These considerations speak a persuasive language to every reflecting and virtuous mind, and exhibit the continuance of the union as a primary object of patriotic desire. Is there a doubt whether a common government can embrace so large a sphere? let experience solve it. To listen to mere speculation in such a case were criminal. We are authorized to hope that a proper organization of the whole, with the auxiliary agency of governments for the respective subdivisions, will afford a happy issue to the experiment. It is well worth a fair and full experiment. With such powerful and obvious motives to union, affecting all parts of our country, while experience shall not have demonstrated its impracticability, there will always be reason to distrust the patriotism of those who, in any quarter, may endeavor to weaken its bands.

In contemplating the causes which may disturb our Union, it occurs as matter of serious concern, that any ground should have been furnished for characterizing parties by geographical discriminations,—northern and southern—Atlantic and western; whence designing men may endeavor to excite a belief that there is a real difference of local interests and views. One of the expedients of party to acquire influence within particular districts, is to misrepresent the opinions and aims of other districts. You cannot shield yourselves too much against the jealousies and heart burnings which spring from these misrepresentations: they tend to render alien to each other those who ought to be bound together by fraternal affection. The inhabitants of our western country have lately had a useful lesson on this head: they have seen, in the negotiation by the executive, and in the unanimous ratification by the senate of the treaty with Spain, and in the universal satisfaction at the event throughout the United States, a decisive proof how unfounded were the suspicions propagated among them of a policy in the general government and in the Atlantic states, unfriendly to their interests in regard to the Mississippi. They have been witnesses to the formation of two treaties, that with Great Britain and that with Spain, which secure to them everything they could desire, in respect to our foreign relations, towards confirming their prosperity. Will it not be their wisdom to rely for the preservation of these advantages on the union by which they were procured? will they not henceforth be deaf to those advisers, if such they are, who would sever them from their brethren and connect them with aliens?

To the efficacy and permanency of your Union, a government for the whole is indispensable. No alliances, however strict, between the parts can be an adequate substitute; they must inevitably experience the infractions and interruptions which all alliances, in all times, have experienced. Sensible of this momentous truth, you have improved upon your first essay, by the adoption of a constitution of government, better calculated than your former, for an intimate union, and for the efficacious management of your common concerns. This government, the offspring of our own choice, uninfluenced and unawed, adopted upon full investigation and mature deliberation, completely free in its principles, in the distribution of its powers, uniting security with energy, and containing within itself a provision for its own amendment, has a just claim to your confidence and your support. Respect for its authority, compliance with its laws, acquiescence in its measures, are duties enjoined by the fundamental maxims of true liberty. The basis of our political systems is the right of the people to make and to alter their constitutions of government.—But the constitution which at any time exists, until changed by an explicit and authentic act of the whole people, is sacredly obligatory upon all. The very idea of the power, and the right of the people to establish government, presuppose the duty of every individual to obey the established government.

All obstructions to the execution of the laws, all combinations and associations under whatever plausible character, with the real design to direct, control, counteract, or awe the regular deliberations and action of the constituted authorities, are destructive of this fundamental principle, and of fatal tendency.—They serve to organize faction, to give it an artificial and extraordinary force, to put in the place of the delegated will of the nation the will of party, often a small but artful and enterprising minority of the community; and, according to the alternate triumphs of different parties, to make the public administration the mirror of the ill concerted and incongruous projects of faction, rather than the organ of consistent and wholesome plans digested by common councils, and modified by mutual interests.

However combinations or associations of the above description may now and then answer popular ends, they are likely, in the course of time and things, to become potent engines, by which cunning, ambitious, and unprincipled men, will be enabled to subvert the power of the people, and to usurp for themselves the reins of government; destroying afterwards the very engines which have lifted them to unjust dominion.

Towards the preservation of your Government and the permanency of your present happy state, it is requisite, not only that you steadily discountenance irregular opposition to its acknowledged authority, but also that you resist with care the spirit of innovation upon its principles, however specious the pretext. One method of assault may be to effect, in the forms of the constitution, alterations which will impair the energy of the system; and thus to undermine what cannot be directly overthrown. In all the changes to which you may be invited, remember that time and habit are at least as necessary to fix the true character of governments, as of other human institutions:—that experience is the surest standard by which to test the real tendency of the existing constitution of a country:—that facility in changes, upon the credit of mere hypothesis and opinion, exposes to perpetual change from the endless variety of hypothesis and opinion: and remember, especially, that for the efficient management of your common interests in a country so extensive as ours, a government of as much vigor as is consistent with the perfect security of liberty is indispensable. Liberty itself will find in such a government, with powers properly distributed and adjusted, its surest guardian. It is, indeed, little else than a name, where the government is too feeble to withstand the enterprises of faction, to confine each member of the society within the limits prescribed by the laws, and to maintain all in the secure and tranquil enjoyment of the rights of person and property.

I have already intimated to you the danger of parties in the state, with particular references to the founding them on geographical discrimination. Let me now take a more comprehensive view, and warn you in the most solemn manner against the baneful effects of the spirit of party generally.

This spirit, unfortunately, is inseparable from our nature, having its root in the strongest passions of the human mind. It exists under different shapes in all governments, more or less stifled, controlled, or repressed; but in those of the popular form it is seen in its greatest rankness, and it is truly their worst enemy.

The alternate domination of one faction over another, sharpened by the spirit of revenge natural to party dissention, which in different ages and countries has perpetrated the most horrid enormities, is itself a frightful despotism. But this leads at length to a more formal and permanent despotism. The disorders and miseries which result, gradually incline the minds of men to seek security and repose in the absolute power of an individual; and, sooner or later, the chief of some prevailing faction, more able or more fortunate than his competitors, turns this disposition to the purpose of his own elevation on the ruins of public liberty.

Without looking forward to an extremity of this kind, (which nevertheless ought not to be entirely out of sight) the common and continual mischiefs of the spirit of party are sufficient to make it the interest and duty of a wise people to discourage and restrain it.

It serves always to distract the public councils, and enfeeble the public administration. It agitates the community with ill-founded jealousies and false alarms; kindles the animosity of one part against another; foment occasional riot and insurrection. It opens the door to foreign influence and corruption, which finds a facilitated access to the Government itself through the channels of party passions. Thus the policy and the will of one country are subjected to the policy and will of another.

There is an opinion that parties in free countries are useful checks upon the administration of the government, and serve to keep alive the spirit of liberty. This within certain limits is probably true; and in governments of a monarchical cast, patriotism may look with indulgence, if not with favor, upon the spirit of party. But in those of the popular character, in governments purely elective, it is a spirit not to be encouraged. From their natural tendency, it is certain there will always be enough of that spirit for every salutary purpose. And there being constant danger of excess, the effort ought to be, by force of public opinion, to mitigate and assuage it. A fire not to be quenched, it demands a uniform vigilance to prevent it bursting into a flame, lest instead of warming it should consume.

It is important likewise, that the habits of thinking in a free country should inspire caution in those intrusted with its administration, to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding in the exercise of the powers of one department, to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism. A just estimate of that love of power and proneness to abuse it which predominate in the human heart, is sufficient to satisfy us of the truth of this position. The necessity of reciprocal checks in the exercise of political power, by dividing and distributing it into different depositories, and constituting each the guardian of the public weal against invasions of the others, has been evinced by experiments ancient and modern: some of them in our country and under our own eyes.—To preserve them must be as necessary as to institute them. If, in the opinion of the people, the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the constitution designates.—But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this, in one instance, may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil, any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield.

Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism, who should labor to subvert these great pillars of human happiness, these firmest props of the duties of men and citizens. The mere politician, equally with the pious man, ought to respect and to cherish them. A volume could not trace all their connections with private and public felicity. Let it simply be asked, where is the security for property, for reputation, for life, if the sense of religious obligation desert the oaths which are the instruments of investigation in courts of justice? And let us with caution indulge the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion. Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on minds of peculiar structure, reason and experience both forbid us to expect, that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle.

It is substantially true, that virtue or morality is a necessary spring of popular government. The rule, indeed, extends with more or less force to every species of free government. Who that is a sincere friend to it can look with indifference upon attempts to shake the foundations of the fabric?

Promote, then, as an object of primary importance, institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge. In proportion as the structure of a government gives force to public opinion, it should be enlightened.

As a very important source of strength and security, cherish public credit. One method of preserving it is to use it as sparingly as possible, avoiding occasions of expense by cultivating peace, but remembering also, that timely disbursements, to prepare for danger, frequently prevent much greater disbursements to repel it; avoiding likewise the accumulation of debt, not only by shunning occasions of expense, but by vigorous exertions, in time of peace, to discharge the debts which unavoidable wars may have occasioned, not ungenerously throwing upon posterity the burden which we ourselves ought to bear. The execution of these maxims belongs to your representatives, but it is necessary that public opinion should co-operate. To facilitate to them the performance of their duty, it is essential that you should practically bear in mind, that towards the payment of debts there must be revenue; that to have revenue there must be taxes; that no taxes can be devised which are not more or less inconvenient and unpleasant; that the intrinsic embarrassment inseparable from the selection of the proper object (which is always a choice of difficulties,) ought to be a decisive motive for a candid construction of the conduct of the government in making it, and for a spirit of acquiescence in the measures for obtaining revenue, which the public exigencies may at any time dictate.

Observe good faith and justice towards all nations; cultivate peace and harmony with all. Religion and morality enjoin this conduct, and can it be that good policy does not equally enjoin it? It will be worthy of a free, enlightened, and, at no distant period, a great nation, to give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a people always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence. Who can doubt but, in the course of time and things, the fruits of such a plan would richly repay any temporary advantages which might be lost by a steady adherence to it; can it be that Providence has not connected the permanent felicity of a nation with its virtue? The experiment, at least, is recommended by every sentiment which ennobles human nature. Alas! is it rendered impossible by its vices?

In the execution of such a plan, nothing is more essential than that permanent, inveterate antipathies against particular nations and passionate attachments for others, should be excluded; and that, in place of them, just and amicable feelings towards all should be cultivated. The nation which indulges towards another an habitual hatred, or an habitual fondness, is in some degree a slave. It is a slave to its animosity or to its affection, either of which is sufficient to lead it astray from its duty and its interest. Antipathy in one nation against another, disposes each more readily to offer insult and injury, to lay hold of slight causes of umbrage, and to be haughty and intractable when accidental or trifling occasions of dispute occur. Hence, frequent collisions, obstinate, envenomed, and bloody contests. The nation, prompted by ill will and resentment, sometimes impels to war the government, contrary to the best calculations of policy. The government sometimes participates in the national propensity, and adopts through passion what reason would reject; at other times, it makes the animosity of the nation subservient to projects of hostility, instigated by pride, ambition, and other sinister and pernicious motives. The peace often, sometimes perhaps the liberty of nations, has been the victim.

So likewise, a passionate attachment of one nation for another produces a variety of evils. Sympathy for the favorite nation, facilitating the illusion of an imaginary common interest, in cases where no real common interest exists, and infusing into one the enmities of the other, betrays the former into a participation in the quarrels and wars of the latter, without adequate inducements or justifications. It leads also to concessions, to the favored nation, of privileges denied to others, which is apt doubly to injure the nation making the concessions, by unnecessarily parting with what ought to have been retained, and by exciting jealousy, ill will, and a disposition to retaliate in the parties from whom equal privileges are withheld; and it gives to ambitious, corrupted or deluded citizens who devote themselves to the favorite nation, facility to betray or sacrifice the interests of their own country, without odium, sometimes even with popularity; gilding with the appearances of a virtuous sense of obligation, a commendable deference for public opinion, or a laudable zeal for public good, the base or foolish compliances of ambition, corruption, or infatuation.

As avenues to foreign influence in innumerable ways, such attachments are particularly alarming to the truly enlightened and independent patriot. How many opportunities do they afford to tamper with domestic factions, to practice the arts of seduction, to mislead public opinion, to influence or awe the public councils!—Such an attachment of a small or weak, towards a great and powerful nation, dooms the former to be the satellite of the latter.

Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence, (I conjure you to believe me fellow-citizens,) the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake; since history and experience prove, that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government. But that jealousy, to be useful, must be impartial, else it becomes the instrument of the very influence to be avoided, instead of a defense against it. Excessive partiality for one foreign nation and excessive dislike for another, cause those whom they actuate to see danger only on one side, and serve to veil and even second the arts of influence on the other. Real patriots, who may resist the intrigues of the favorite, are liable to become suspected and odious; while its tools and dupes usurp the applause and confidence of the people, to surrender their interests.

The great rule of conduct for us, in regard to foreign nations, is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements, let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith:—Here let us stop.

Europe has a set of primary interests, which to us have none, or a very remote relation. Hence, she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves, by artificial ties, in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics, or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities.

Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course. If we remain one people, under an efficient government, the period is not far off when we may defy material injury from external annoyance; when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon, to be scrupulously respected; when belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not lightly hazard the giving us provocation, when we may choose peace or war, as our interest, guided by justice, shall counsel.

Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalry, interest, humor, or caprice?

It is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliance with any portion of the foreign world; so far, I mean, as we are now at liberty to do it; for let me not be understood as capable of patronizing infidelity to existing engagements. I hold the maxim no less applicable to public than private affairs, that honesty is always the best policy. I repeat it, therefore, let those engagements be observed in their genuine sense. But in my opinion, it is unnecessary, and would be unwise to extend them.

Taking care always to keep ourselves by suitable establishments, on a respectable defensive posture, we may safely trust to temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies.

Harmony, and a liberal intercourse with all nations, are recommended by policy, humanity, and interest. But even our commercial policy should hold an equal and impartial hand; neither seeking nor granting exclusive favors or preferences; consulting the natural course of things; diffusing and diversifying by gentle means the streams of commerce, but forcing nothing; establishing with powers so disposed, in order to give trade a stable course, to define the rights of our merchants, and to enable the Government to support them, conventional rules of intercourse, the best that present circumstances and mutual opinion will permit, but temporary, and liable to be from time to time abandoned or varied as experience and circumstances shall dictate; constantly keeping in view, that it is folly in one nation to look for disinterested favors from another; that it must pay with a portion of its independence for whatever it may accept under that character; that by such acceptance, it may place itself in the condition of having given equivalents for nominal favors, and yet of being reproached with ingratitude for not giving more. There can be no greater error than to expect, or calculate upon real favors from nation to nation. It is an illusion which experience must cure, which a just pride ought to discard.

In offering to you, my countrymen, these counsels of an old and affectionate friend, I dare not hope they will make the strong and lasting impression I could wish; that they will control the usual current of the passions, or prevent our nation from running the course which has hitherto marked the destiny of nations, but if I may even flatter myself that they may be productive of some partial benefit, some occasional good; that they may now and then recur to moderate the fury of party spirit, to warn against the mischiefs of foreign intrigue, to guard against the impostures of pretended patriotism; this hope will be a full recompense for the solicitude for your welfare by which they have been dictated.

How far, in the discharge of my official duties, I have been guided by the principles which have been delineated, the public records and other evidences of my conduct must witness to you and to the world. To myself, the assurance of my own conscience is, that I have, at least, believed myself to be guided by them.

In relation to the still subsisting war in Europe, my proclamation of the 22d of April, 1793, is the index to my plan. Sanctioned by your approving voice, and by that of your representatives in both houses of congress, the spirit of that measure has continually governed me, uninfluenced by any attempts to deter or divert me from it.

After deliberate examination, with the aid of the best lights I could obtain, I was well satisfied that our country, under all the circumstances of the case, had a right to take, and was bound, in duty and interest, to take a neutral position. Having taken it, I determined, as far as should depend upon me, to maintain it with moderation, perseverance and firmness.

The considerations which respect the right to hold this conduct, it is not necessary on this occasion to detail. I will only observe that, according to my understanding of the matter, that right, so far from being denied by any of the belligerent powers, has been virtually admitted by all.

The duty of holding a neutral conduct may be inferred, without any thing more, from the obligation which justice and humanity impose on every nation, in cases in which it is free to act, to maintain inviolate the relations of peace and amity towards other nations.

The inducements of interest for observing that conduct will best be referred to your own reflections and experience. With me, a predominant motive has been to endeavor to gain time to our country to settle and mature its yet recent institutions, and to progress, without interruption, to that degree of strength, and consistency which is necessary to give it, humanly speaking, the command of its own fortunes.

Though in reviewing the incidents of my administration, I am unconscious of intentional error, I am nevertheless too sensible of my defects not to think it probable that I may have committed many errors. Whatever they may be, I fervently beseech the Almighty to avert or mitigate the evils to which they may tend. I shall also carry with me the hope that my country will never cease to view them with indulgence; and that, after forty-five years of my life dedicated to its service, with an upright zeal, the faults of incompetent abilities will be consigned to oblivion, as myself must soon be to the mansions of rest.

Relying on its kindness in this as in other things, and actuated by that fervent love towards it, which is so natural to a man who views it in the native soil of himself and his progenitors for several generations; I anticipate with pleasing expectation that retreat in which I promise myself to realize, without alloy, the sweet enjoyment of partaking, in the midst of my fellow citizens, the benign influence of good laws under a free government—the ever favorite object of my heart, and the happy reward, as I trust, of our mutual cares, labors and dangers.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES,
17th September, 1796.

TREATY WITH JAPAN.

Mr. LODGE obtained the floor.

Mr. HEFLIN. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me?

Mr. LODGE. I desire to make a motion first. I move that the Senate proceed, in open executive session, to the consideration of the treaty between the United States and Japan relating to the mandated islands, particularly to the island of Yap.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Senate proceed, in open executive session, to the consideration of the treaty with Japan concerning the island of Yap, and so forth.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, as a substitute for the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, I move that the treaty be recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order. I think a motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business is not amendable by a substitute and is not debatable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that the point of order is well taken. The Chair has some doubt as to whether the original motion is in order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. A motion to recommit the treaty is not in order before we go into executive session.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly not. It has to be taken up first. Was the motion I made agreed to?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts couple with his motion for an executive session a motion that the Senate proceed in open executive session to the consideration of a particular subject?

Mr. LODGE. I made the usual motion, Mr. President, which I made over and over again when the Senate was considering the German treaties. I moved that the Senate proceed to consider the treaty in open executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is in doubt as to the Senator's original motion.

Mr. LODGE. Then I make a motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business in open executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business in open executive session.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. The first item on the Executive Calendar is the treaty with Japan, and I move that the Senate proceed to its consideration, if a motion is necessary.

Mr. WARREN and Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wyoming desire to be recognized?

Mr. LODGE. I will yield to the Senator in a moment. Let me get up the treaty first.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There are three Senators who have addressed the Chair.

Mr. LODGE. I think I have the floor, and I have made a motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has the floor, but other Senators can address the Chair at the same time.

Mr. HEFLIN. I wanted the Senator to yield to me. I will wait until he gets the treaty up, and then I will ask him to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. LODGE. I will yield as soon as I get the treaty before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the treaty with Japan.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, proceeded to consider the treaty between the United States and Japan with regard to the rights of the two Governments and their respective nationals in the former German islands in the Pacific Ocean, lying north of the Equator, in particular the island of Yap, signed at Washington on February 11, 1922.

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] that he may submit a report from the Committee on Appropriations.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. WARREN. As in legislative session, from the Committee on Appropriations, I report back favorably with amendments the bill (H. R. 10329) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 510) thereon. I give notice that I shall undertake to call up the bill for consideration to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

As in legislative session,

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhues, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7158) to amend the Army appropriation act approved July 11, 1919, so as to release appropriations for the completion of the acquisition of real estate in certain cases and making additional appropriations therefor, requested a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. McKENZIE, Mr. GREENE of Vermont, and Mr. FIELDS were appointed managers of the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 7) to amend section 2 of the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution to authorize the operation of Government-owned radio stations for the use of the general public, and for other purposes," approved June 5, 1920, requested a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts, Mr. WHITE of Maine, Mr. CHINDBLOM, Mr. LAZARO, and Mr. BANKHEAD were appointed managers of the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had passed bills of the following titles, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 9597. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the President to provide housing for war needs," approved May 16, 1918; and

H. R. 10193. An act extending time for allotments on the Crow Reservation; protecting certain members of the Five Civilized Tribes; relief of Indians occupying certain lands in Arizona, New Mexico, and California; issuing patents in certain cases; establishing a revolving fund on the Rosebud Reservation; memorial to Indians of the Rosebud Reservation killed in the World War; conferring authority on the Secretary of the Interior as to alienation in certain Indian allotments; and for other purposes.

FEDERAL RESERVE BANK AT ATLANTA.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. I have a short resolution to offer asking for an investigation of the political activities of the Federal reserve bank at Atlanta. I ask to have it read and for its present consideration. If it leads to debate, I will withdraw it.

Mr. LODGE. I do not want to interfere with the resolution, but we are now in executive session.

Mr. HEFLIN. I ask leave to offer the resolution as in legislative session. If it leads to debate, I will withdraw it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent for the presentation of a resolution as in legislative session. Is there objection?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I reserve the right to object until I can know the purport of the resolution.

Mr. HEFLIN. It is short. I ask that it may be read.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I would like to hear the resolution, so that I may know whether I will give consent or not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Assistant Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 242), as follows:

Whereas it is alleged that the officials of the Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta have been and are mailing out literature and speeches of a political nature designed to influence public opinion and injuriously affect the standing and service of a United States Senator; and

Whereas it is alleged that said officers are paying for the distribution of said literature and speeches out of the funds of said Federal reserve bank, in violation of law; and

Whereas the Senate would regard with keen disapproval the attempt on the part of any one of the Federal reserve banks to use its power to influence or coerce politically any banker or anyone else in its district; and

Whereas Congress in creating the Federal reserve banking system desired and intended that it should at all times be kept free from political activities; and

Whereas such activities of officers of the said Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta are alleged to be the result of the suggestion of the Federal Reserve Board, or some member thereof, and are contrary to law and sound public policy: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Chair shall appoint five Senators, who shall constitute a committee to investigate said actions of said board and bank and report to the Senate their findings thereon and recommendations touching said alleged actions and political activities.

Resolved further, That said committee shall have power to send for persons, papers, and books, to administer oaths and take testimony, to employ a stenographer and pay for his services at not more than $1.25 per printed page of said testimony; and all costs accruing hereunder shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by said committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent to present the resolution just read by the Secretary. Is there objection?

Mr. HEFLIN. And I ask for its present consideration as in legislative session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama must have unanimous consent to present the resolution.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have no objection to the Senator having the resolution presented.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. LODGE. I object to its being considered now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has not suggested that question as yet. The Senator from Alabama now asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution so presented. Is there objection?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. HEFLIN. I ask that the resolution may lie on the table for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will go over under the rule.

TREATY WITH JAPAN.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, proceeded to consider the treaty between the United States and Japan with regard to the rights of the two Governments and their respective nationals in the former German islands in the Pacific Ocean lying north of the Equator, in particular the island of Yap, signed at Washington on February 11, 1922.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Maryland wants to make a motion to recommit. I have only to say that I am in charge of this treaty, which I desire to lay before the Senate, and in regard to which I want to make a short statement, but before I have made my statement the Senator from Maryland proposes to make a motion to recommit. I think at least the Senate is entitled to have the treaty presented, and I think in all fairness I am entitled to make a statement in regard to it.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I will say, in response to the Senator, that I have not renewed my motion to recommit the treaty.

Mr. LODGE. I am much obliged to the Senator.

Mr. FRANCE. My reason for not doing so is because I fear that we have not at present a sufficient number who would support the motion to justify me in making it, although I am quite persuaded that after the treaty has been examined there will be a sufficient number of Senators who will support a motion to recommit it. I shall, however, not renew my motion at this time, and shall, of course, be very glad to have the Senator from Massachusetts proceed with the treaty, although I had announced that at the close of the morning business to-day I would take up another matter which I deemed to be of much more importance.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have made a privileged motion, after giving due notice. If the Senator objects to my going on he has an opportunity to divide the Senate and take a vote. I have reported, and I feel I am entitled to have considered, a measure of the first importance—a treaty submitted by the President of the United States—and I do not think that it can be set aside properly by taking up some other subject. It is for the Senate to decide, of course.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, as I stated to the Senator, I have no desire to renew my motion at this time. I had hoped to discuss to-day a matter which I consider to be of very great importance, and I am quite persuaded that if the Senator undertakes to explain why a Republican committee, representing a Republican administration, should bring such a measure as this before the Senate and explain it satisfactorily it will certainly require the rest of this calendar day and many days subsequent.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, well, Mr. President, there is no need of making a threat to filibuster. I shall take but little time, and will be as brief as I possibly can, in laying the treaty before the Senate. It will then be for the Senate to determine when it will go on with it, and I shall give the Senate an opportunity to go on with it every day.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President—

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. NORRIS. I understood the Senator from Massachusetts to yield to me.

Mr. LODGE. I will first yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. McNARY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brandagee	Gooding	Nelson	Shortridge
Barsum	Harris	New	Simmons
Calden	Harrison	Newberry	Smith
Cameron	Heflin	Nicholson	Spencer
Capper	Johnson	Norbeck	Stanfield
Caraway	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Sterling
Coit	Kellogg	Oddie	Townsend
Culberson	Kendrick	Overman	Trammell
Cummins	King	Page	Underwood
Edge	Ladd	Phipps	Wadsworth
Elkins	Lodge	Pittman	Walsh, Mass.
Ernst	McKellar	Poin Dexter	Walsh, Mont.
Fletcher	McKinley	Pomerene	Warren
France	McNary	Ransdell	Watson, Ga.
Gerry	Moses	Robinson	Weller
Glass	Myers	Sheppard	Williams

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] is absent on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to announce that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROO] is absent on account of sickness.

I was requested to announce that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CUR-TIS], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] are detained at a hearing before the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The Senator from Massachusetts will proceed.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the treaty which is now before the Senate, made between the United States and Japan, contains two subjects—the mandated islands of Japan, as they are called, and in particular the island of Yap. I am first going to explain the provisions of the treaty in regard to the mandated islands.

Under the treaty of Versailles Japan was given a mandate for the German islands in the Pacific lying north of the Equator. There was a claim at one time that she had a title to those islands under the secret treaties. I was never able to learn that there was any title there, because the only agreement that I was able to find was contained in the notes exchanged between the British ambassador and the Government at Tokyo as to the islands north and south of the Equator in the Pacific. I think any claim to title of that sort under the secret treaties was abandoned.

Germany's overseas possessions were, by the treaty of Versailles, given absolutely and without condition to the five principal allied and associated powers, of which the United States was one. The last administration and the present administration have both taken the ground, and have taken it very strongly, that the fact that the United States did not ratify the Versailles treaty and is not a member of the League of Nations in no respect alters the title of the United States given by the treaty of Versailles to the five principal allied and associated powers conveying the German overseas possessions. Without reference to our having refused to ratify the treaty, we are entitled to one undivided one-fifth part of the overseas possessions formerly belonging to Germany, and Japan, by the assent of the other three powers, is entitled to four undivided fifth parts of the islands mandated to her in the Pacific.

This contention, which was made under President Wilson's administration, more particularly in reference to Palestine and Mesopotamia, was renewed by the present administration and was made applicable to the islands of the Pacific. This contention of the United States has been admitted. It is admitted by this treaty by its very existence, because the first two articles relate entirely to the mandated islands. It has also been recognized in regard to the mandated islands south of the Equator which were given to the British Empire, to Australia, and to New Zealand.

We have, therefore, established our position, and on that basis we have made this treaty with Japan in regard to the mandated islands, and I am speaking of them all, north of the Equator. Those islands were the Carolines, the Mariana, or Ladrone Islands, of which Guam, belonging to us, is one, and the Marshall Islands. They are all very small and unimportant islands with the exception of Guam. At the conclusion of the Spanish War we were, of course, in a position to have taken possession of all the Spanish islands, but it was thought by the United States Government at that time that the islands were of no importance, that they were of no interest to us, and we left them in the hands of Spain, excepting always the island of Guam. In the year after the war, 1899, Spain sold those islands to Germany for $4,000,000, and when taken away from Germany they passed to Japan.

In giving our consent to the mandate, which we had never before given, we extended certain conditions which exist in the mandate given to Japan by the other powers. The mandate under which the British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan agreed to confer upon the Emperor of Japan the mandate are printed in the preamble of this treaty, and those which are of importance to us are made a part of the treaty, articles 3, 4, and 5.

Article 2 of the treaty contains the additional conditions which we have imposed in addition to those contained in the mandate. We have added to the conditions of the mandate given to Japan by the four powers the right of our missionaries to erect religious buildings and to open schools throughout the islands. We have also provided that vested American property rights in the mandated islands shall be respected and in no way impaired; that existing treaties between the United States and Japan shall be applicable to the mandated islands; that Japan shall address to the United States a duplicate of the annual report of the administration of the mandate to be made by

Japan to the Council of the League of Nations. The treaty also provides, and Japan agrees to all these conditions, that—

Nothing contained in the present convention shall be affected by any modification which may be made in the terms of the mandate as recited in the convention, unless such modification shall have been expressly assented to by the United States.

Those selected conditions of the mandate given to Japan by the other powers and made part of this treaty provide that the slave trade shall be prohibited; that traffic in arms and munitions shall be controlled in accordance with principles analogous to those laid down in the convention relating to the control of the arms traffic in the convention of September 10, 1919; that the supply of intoxicating spirits and beverages to the natives shall be prohibited; that the military training of the natives, otherwise than for purposes of internal police, is prohibited, and that no military or naval bases shall be established or fortifications erected in the territory; that the mandatory shall insure in the territory freedom of conscience and the free exercise of all forms of worship and shall allow all missionaries, nationals of any State member of the League of Nations, to enter into, travel, and reside in the territory for the purpose of prosecuting their calling. All these provisions, as I have said, are made part of our treaty, and I have read the additional conditions which we have imposed.

The other two articles of the treaty relate to the Island of Yap. That is an island which has come into quite recent notoriety. I think it is safe to say that four years ago nobody had ever heard of it. I am going to read, therefore, a brief discussion of the Island of Yap and then explain its importance.

I read from a memorandum furnished me by the Division of Far Eastern Affairs in the State Department:

The island of Yap is located in the Pacific Ocean at approximately 138° east longitude and 9° north latitude, about 1,600 miles south of Yokohama and 700 miles east of the northeastern end of Mindanao, the southernmost island of the Philippine group. The island is about 15 miles long in the northeast and southwest direction and tapers from about 8 miles in width at the northeastern end to a point at the southwestern end. Like most of the Pacific islands, it is surrounded by coral reefs making approach difficult for large steamers. The only harbor of real value is Tomil Bay, which opens to the south on the eastern side of the island and divides it into two unequal portions. The northeastern end of the island is traversed by a ridge of hills, the highest of which is about 1,000 feet above the sea. The southern portion is flat and covered with tropical vegetation.

The climate is warm and moist, the precipitation amounting to about 130 inches a year, two-thirds of which falls in the summer season. The temperature does not vary greatly during the year, remaining in the neighborhood of 81° F. Yap is at times visited by typhoons during the summer, and is on the edge of the monsoon or trade-wind belt. These winds blow from the northeast during the winter months and from the southwest during the spring and early summer.

The population, according to the latest information available, is about 8,000, of which less than 100 is foreign. Of the foreign population about 70 are Japanese. The natives are said to be of Malay origin with a slight admixture of Polynesian. Their diet consists of fish and such vegetable products as sweet potatoes, yams, bananas, and breadfruit.

The only commercial products of more than local value are copra and a timber which resembles mahogany. Owing to the small size of the island neither of these commodities is available in any quantity.

Tomil Bay, referred to above as the only harbor of value, is difficult of approach for large steamers because of the narrow, winding entrance through the coral reefs.

It is possible that phosphate rock may be found in Yap, as deposits exist in other of the Pelew Islands, but none has been discovered so far as is known at present, although the Germans are understood to have made extensive economic surveys.

In view of the lack of natural resources on the island, the low state of civilization of the inhabitants, the trying climate, and the absence of any harbor useful for commercial steamers of any size, it seems improbable that there can be much economic development.

I will also read a letter from the Secretary of State:

Referring to the inquiry which you made the other day regarding rights of the Government of the United States with respect to the island of Yap prior to the war, I beg to inform you that it appears that this Government had no treaty rights with respect to this island at that time.

Following the adjustment in 1885 of the dispute between Germany and Spain with regard to the Caroline Islands, among which is Yap, the Government of the United States sought through a diplomatic communication addressed to the Government of Spain to obtain from that Government assurances that citizens of the United States, particularly missionaries, would receive treatment no less favorable than that of Germans or other foreigners in the islands. Such assurances were given.

In 1899 the islands were ceded by Spain to Germany. No treaty stipulations were concluded with the latter country prior to the war with regard to the treatment of American citizens in the islands. For discussions with respect to the status of the islands and the treatment of American citizens therein, I may refer you to Moore's Digest, Vol. V, pp. 863-864, and Foreign Relations, 1886, pp. 831-834.

Mr. President, such is the island of Yap. Its importance grows out of the fact that our naval authorities and possibly others have regarded it as being of great value for telegraph communications, as a point where there may be relaying and interchange of telegraphic messages. The only cable of which I am aware that now runs to Yap is the Dutch cable, which runs from Borneo to Mindanao, thence to Yap, thence to Guam, and thence to Shanghai, whence the terminal was removed, as a German cable, I think, during the war to Tokio. We have no cable at Yap. The American cable runs to Guam; from Guam to the Philippines, and thence to China. I am not aware that we have any direct telegraphic interest in Yap, although the Dutch cable is of considerable value to us for commercial purposes.

At Paris President Wilson and Mr. Lansing made representations very strongly and with some elaboration in two or three meetings on April 30 and on May 6 and 7, 1919, in regard to this island and the desirability either of its being internationalized or of special arrangements being made in regard to it, owing to its value as a telegraphic station. Evidently there was some misunderstanding relative to the matter, because when the decisions of the representatives of the great powers who made the treaty were published subsequent to May 7, among the questions decided the understanding supposed by Mr. Wilson to exist relative to Yap did not appear. How that happened I do not profess to know, but President Wilson informed the Senate committee that he had supposed there was complete understanding in regard to it, and his administration made, on what I consider very good grounds, opposition to Japan's occupancy of Yap on account of that omission from the decisions of the conference at Paris, which was finally agreed to, of President Wilson's representations in regard to the island. The present administration, through the Secretary of State, Mr. Hughes, took similar ground in regard to the possession of Yap, but based their position not only on the misunderstanding at Paris but also on the broad ground that Yap was one of the mandated islands, and that we, therefore, were an owner of an undivided fifth part of the island. Japan declined to accept the view of the United States in regard to the transactions at Paris and also at that time in regard to our right to a fifth part of the island. The situation had reached the point, therefore, where we had either to leave the question open, in statu quo, in which case we should have had none of the rights which we desired to obtain in Yap; Japan would have excluded us from the use of the island and we could only have asserted our rights there by force, which, of course, we did not contemplate doing, or we had to negotiate in regard to the controversy.

These negotiations began last summer and were continued until the treaty was practically almost completed at the time the conference met. The treaty has nothing to do with the conference treaties; it is an independent and entirely separate agreement. Under this treaty we secure the rights set forth in article 3 and article 4, and those provisions give to the United States every privilege she has ever sought to obtain upon the island. The first paragraph of article 3 reads as follows:

The United States and its nationals shall have free access to the island of Yap on a footing of entire equality with Japan or any other nation and their respective nationals in all that relates to the landing and operation of the existing Yap-Guam cable or of any cable which may hereafter be laid or operated by the United States or by its nationals connecting with the island of Yap.

Then, it is provided that unless Japan provides us with "an adequate radiotelegraphic station, cooperating effectively with the cables and with other radio stations on ships or on shore, without discriminatory exactions or preferences, we shall have the right to establish radiotelegraphic stations ourselves.

Article 4 provides that—

Nationals of the United States shall have the unrestricted right to reside in the island, and the United States and its nationals shall have the right to acquire and hold on a footing of entire equality with Japan or any other nation or their respective nationals all kinds of property and interests, both personal and real, including lands, buildings, residences, offices, works, and appurtenances.

It is further provided in article 4 that nationals of the United States are not to be obliged "to obtain any permit or license in order to be entitled to land and operate cables," and that "no censorship or supervision shall be exercised over cable or radio messages or operations."

It is also provided that—

Nationals of the United States shall have complete freedom of entry and exit in the islands for their persons and property.

No taxes, port, harbor, or landing charges or exactions of any nature whatsoever shall be levied either with respect to the operation of cables or radio stations, or with respect to property, persons, or vessel.

No discriminatory police regulations shall be enforced. The Government of Japan agrees to exercise its power of expropriation in the island to secure to the United States or its nationals needed property and facilities for the purpose of electrical communications if such property or facilities can not otherwise be obtained.

We acquire, under the treaty, rights which we have never had heretofore and all the rights which we have ever desired to obtain; we also settle what has been an annoying dispute running over three years since the making of the Paris treaty.

I think, Mr. President, I have now stated all the facts in regard to the treaty, which is a very simple one, it seems to me a very beneficial one, and which removes a subject of controversy on excellent terms to the United States.

I have nothing further to say in regard to it. Of course, if there are any questions that any Senator desires to ask me in regard to the treaty, I shall be only too happy to answer them if it is in my power to do so.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I propound a question to the Senator?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator understand that the treaty limits the rights of American nationals to those individuals who may be engaged in what might be denominated electrical activities upon the island—that is, activities relating to the laying of cables and the setting up of wireless or other telegraphic apparatus?

Mr. LODGE. I do not think it is limited in that way. The first paragraph of article 4 reads:

Nationals of the United States shall have the unrestricted right to reside in the island, and the United States and its nationals shall have the right to acquire and hold on a footing of entire equality with Japan or any other nation or their respective nationals all kinds of property and interests, both personal and real, including lands, buildings, residences, offices, works, and appurtenances.

That, it seems to me, is as broad as it could possibly be made.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, I invite his attention to article 4:

In connection with the rights embraced by article 3, specific rights, privileges, and exemptions, in so far as they relate to electrical communications, shall be enjoyed in the island of Yap by the United States and its nationals in terms as follows—

Then follow the terms under which the nationals of the United States may have unrestricted rights; and I was wondering whether the interpretation of this—

Mr. LODGE. I do not think that limits it in the least. I think they have absolute rights; but it does not make any difference whether this treaty limits it or not, because under the general mandate of Japan, which is made part of this treaty, and which we have extended under article 2, it is said that vested American property rights in the mandated islands shall be respected and in no way impaired, and that existing treaties between the United States and Japan shall be applicable to the mandated islands, among which treaties are those of commerce and navigation giving all the rights usual among nations. All the provisions of the mandate are made part of this treaty; and I think every right is secured that can be secured in any of the mandated islands. I do not apprehend that many people are going to Yap to settle.

Mr. KING. I agree with the Senator; but yet it occurred to me that there might be some diversity of opinion as to whether these rights extended to nationals for any legitimate purpose there or whether their rights upon the islands were restricted to those activities that would be related to the business of setting up cables, electrical apparatus, wireless apparatus, and so forth.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, they relate chiefly to that, because that is the only value the islands have.

Mr. FRANCE obtained the floor.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President—

Mr. FRANCE. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. I realize that the Senator from Maryland has given notice that he will address the Senate to-day on a different subject than that which is pending, and I do not desire to trespass at all upon his time, as he has given notice of his address, but I should like to know if he would object if I took 15 minutes on the treaty. I will yield the floor to the Senator at the end of that time, or prior to that time, if he desires.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, of course if I lose the floor I have no means of regaining it, unless I am recognized by the Chair. Would the Senator from Nevada have any right to yield me the floor? However, under unanimous consent, if the Senator can be permitted to proceed with that understanding I shall be very glad to allow him to proceed.

I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Nevada may proceed for 15 minutes of my time, with the understanding that I am to have the floor when he concludes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection?

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I do not want any unanimous-consent agreement of that kind. We can not parcel out the time by such a unanimous-consent agreement. I may desire to ask the Senator from Nevada some questions on this treaty if he speaks on it.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I withdraw the request. I see that there is a possibility of any arrangement that might be made being disturbed, and I have no desire to annoy the Senator from Maryland or to be the cause of any annoyance. I will simply state that as soon as I can get the opportunity I shall take 15 or 20 minutes for the purpose of discussing that portion of the treaty which is involved in the questions asked by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. I may say that I am firmly of opinion that the Senator from Massachusetts has not given the proper construction to the treaty, and that our nationals have not the same rights in the island of Yap or any of the former German overseas islands.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I simply want to express the opinion that it is entirely within the power of the Senate to give unanimous consent to a Senator to address the Senate for 15 minutes, and at the end of that time other Senators can proceed. In my opinion it is entirely within the power of the Senate by unanimous consent. If, however, the Senator does not ask it, of course the request is not before the Senate.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] objected.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It is entirely within the power of any Senator to object to unanimous consent being granted, in which case there is no unanimous consent; but if there is unanimous consent it is within the power of the Senate to make such an agreement.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, not only is it true that the end sought by the Senator from Nevada may be accomplished in the way suggested by the Senator from Connecticut, but the Senator from Maryland may, by consent of the Senate, yield to the Senator from Nevada, and, as a matter of fact, that practice is pursued in the Senate almost daily; and unless objection should be made he could yield now, or any number of times during the course of his remarks if desired to do so.

Mr. FRANCE. I thank the Senator for his suggestion, and I will say that I have already asked for such unanimous consent, and objection has been made by the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. ROBINSON. No; there was no objection made. There was the suggestion that such a unanimous-consent agreement could not be made because it would constitute a parceling out of the time of the Senate. As a matter of fact, under the practice of the Senate it is entirely proper to make such an arrangement; and I suggest that the request for unanimous consent be submitted, and Senators can, of course, object if they desire.

Mr. LODGE. I do not see how the Senate is going to make an agreement that the Chair shall recognize a given Senator at a given time.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Maryland be permitted to yield to the Senator from Nevada for a period of 20 minutes, or such portion of that time as he may desire to consume.

Mr. KELLOGG. I object.

Mr. ROBINSON. Of course it is entirely competent for a Senator to object to any request for unanimous consent.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, the subject which I desire to discuss is not remote from the question of this treaty. Indeed, it is closely related to it.

I expressed surprise that the Foreign Relations Committee had so promptly reported this treaty to the Senate, for, of course, the ratification of this treaty would, in my judgment, be a repudiation of the platform pledges of the Republican Party, for it would clearly do in part what the League of Nations proposed to do in entirety; and I will say that its very purpose is to accomplish in part what the League of Nations was designed to accomplish in its entirety.

Stripped of all hypocrisy and stripped of all verbiage, what did the League of Nations propose to do? I need not tell the Senators nor need I tell the people of this country that back of every great policy there are practical men with practical purposes to accomplish, and practical men, and very practical men, are back of this treaty.

The League of Nations, stripped of all its verbiage and hypocrisy—and it was involved in both—was designed to do two things: To carry on an economic war against Germany, after the declaration of peace, and to get us into a coalition or an alliance of nations which was to guarantee the territory of the great empires—territory acquired before the war and territory acquired as a result of the war. That is beyond dispute.

On May 5, 1919, a meeting was held between the three statesmen who were responsible for the submission of this plan—President Wilson, Clemenceau, and Lloyd-George—and they made a tentative agreement as to the disposition of the territories which were to be transferred to the allied and associated powers under the provisions of the treaty. I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point a list of these territories and the tentative agreement as to their disposition.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
April 12, 1921.

Mr. FRANCE introduced the following joint resolution; which was read twice and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 11) authorizing the President of the United States to undertake negotiations for the purchase of the territories in east, southwest, and west Africa, and in Oceania, over which Germany exercised sovereignty prior to the war; to undertake negotiations with a view to acquiring by purchase or otherwise the cables surrendered under article 244, Annex VII, of the treaty of peace with Germany; to enter upon the negotiation of a treaty of international comity, commerce, and cooperation with the allied associated powers looking to the development of the human and natural resources of Africa; to urge the fixing by the allied and associated powers of a just and reasonable indemnity to be paid by Germany to said powers; and to negotiate for the settlement of the principal sums and interest that represent the debts now owing by the said allied and associated powers to the United States, and for other purposes.

Whereas, since the 11th day of November, 1918, when the President of the United States announced the signing of an armistice between the United States and the powers with which the United States had been at war, little progress has been made toward the rehabilitation of the European nations, and there are widespread financial and industrial depression, unemployment, misery, and social unrest; and

Whereas the dismemberment and bankruptcy of Austria, the disorganization and insolvency of Germany, the unfavorable conditions in Italy, the isolation of Russia from the world's trade, and the diminished purchasing power of the European countries because of the enormous debts owed by certain of the European nations to the United States, have created conditions which tend to prevent the sale and shipment from the United States of the raw products and food supplies so desperately needed in Europe for the rehabilitation of industry and the feeding of starving peoples; and

Whereas a satisfactory settlement or liquidation of the huge debts and obligations growing out of the war, owed by certain countries to other countries in Europe and to the United States, now seems to be necessary, if there is to be a speedy rehabilitation of industry in Europe and in the United States; and

Whereas cordial and constructive cooperation between the advanced nations for the solving of these serious financial, industrial, and international problems and for the advancement of the backward peoples and the development of the undeveloped natural resources of the world has become a necessity; and

Whereas the submarine telegraphic cables to which Germany under the peace treaty renounced all rights, titles, and privileges in favor of the principal allied and associated powers, have become the subject of a controversy in which the interests of the United States are vitally involved: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, etc., That the President be authorized to call and enter an international conference of the principal allied and associated powers—Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan—for the formulation of plans for the adjustment or settlement of the international debts and obligations growing out of the war, particularly the debts owed by certain of the principal allied and associated powers to the United States; that the President be further authorized to urge international policies and actions for the relief of the overburdened and bankrupt peoples by the extension of credits; that the President be authorized to promote the export trade of the United States with Europe, with Asia, and with Africa by the removal of financial and artificial barriers and restrictions; to negotiate the acquisition for the United States of the territories in east, southwest, and west Africa, and in Oceania over which Germany exercised sovereignty prior to the war; to undertake negotiations with a view to acquiring, by purchase or otherwise, from the principal allied and associated powers, the cables surrendered under article 244, Annex VII, of the treaty of peace with Germany; to enter upon negotiations looking to a treaty providing for international comity, commerce, and cooperation between the United States and the principal allied and associated powers for the purpose of the upbuilding and development of the peoples and of the natural resources of Africa, Oceania, and of the backward portions of the world; and to urge the fixing by the principal allied and associated powers of a just and reasonable indemnity to be paid by Germany to said powers.

SEC. 2. That the President, in order to arrive at a just and equitable determination and settlement of all debts growing out of the war, particularly those owed by the principal allied and associated powers, or any of them, each to the other or to the United States, be, and he is hereby, authorized to enter upon conversations and negotiations with the said principal allied and associated powers, namely, with Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan:

(a) For the determination of the extent of the debts and obligations owed by Germany to the principal allied and associated powers, the debts and obligations owed by any one of the principal allied and associated powers to any other power and those owed by the principal allied and associated powers to the United States; and that the President be, and he is hereby, authorized—

(b) To urge upon the principal allied and associated powers the immediate necessity for fixing the indemnity sum to be paid to the principal allied and associated powers at such an amount as can be met by Germany without an undue strain and disturbance of international financial and trade arrangements, and to recommend to and urge upon the principal allied and associated powers that such indemnity sum should be, in addition to the sums already paid by Germany in money or in kind, approximately, and not to exceed that named by the principal allied and associated powers, Great Britain and France, at the Hythe conference, tentatively, namely, the principal sum not to exceed $15,000,000,000, or not more than $1,000,000,000 in gold a year for 28 years, and further to urge, upon this sum, a credit to Germany of approximately $5,000,000,000 be allowed for full, final, and unconditional cession to the said principal allied and associated powers and to the United States of the territories in Africa and Oceania, which were, prior to the war, under German sovereignty, namely, Togoland, Kamerun, German East Africa, German Southwest Africa, German Samoa Island, German Pacific Islands.

(c) To enter upon conversations and negotiations with Great Britain, France, and Italy looking to the purchase by the United States from the said powers of the colonial territories in Africa over which, prior to the war, Germany exercised sovereignty, territories with an area approximately of 1,032,280 square miles.

(d) To enter upon conversations and negotiations with the said principal allied and associated powers, including Japan, looking to the purchase by the United States of the Samoan Islands and of the islands in the Pacific over which Germany exercised sovereignty prior to the war.

(e) To enter upon conversations and negotiations with Germany and Japan for a full and unconditional release by them, or either of them, of all rights, titles, or privileges of whatever nature which they, or either of them, might claim or have in said territories or islands in the Pacific.

(f) To enter upon conversations and negotiations for the acquisition by the United States from the principal allied and associated powers, or from any of them, and from Germany any residual right which she may claim, indeed, all rights, titles, or privileges of whatever nature which they, or any of them, may claim or have in the submarine cables to which Germany, under article 244, Annex VII, renounced all rights, titles, or privileges to the said principal allied and associated powers.

SEC. 3. That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to enter upon such conversations and negotiations looking to the purchase by the United States from the principal allied and associated powers of the said territories and of the said submarine cables, with a view to relieving the said principal allied and associated powers—Great Britain, France, and Italy—by a credit to them on the debts which they owe the United States of the amount of the purchase price which the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay by such a credit on said debts for the said territories and submarine cables, namely, a sum approximately $5,000,000,000 and not to exceed $6,000,000,000.

SEC. 4. That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized, in the event of a successful termination of the negotiations for the purchase by the United States of the said territories and submarine cables, to enter upon further negotiations looking to treaty agreements between the United States, Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, and Germany for cordial international cooperation in solving the problems of Africa and for the development of the undeveloped natural resources of Africa by the formulation of plans for the reclamation of waste lands, for the utilization of the natural resources, including water power, for wise colonization, particularly by the citizens of the overcrowded countries, and for the promotion of education and civilization throughout Africa in the interests of the people of Africa and of all the nations of the world.

SEC. 5. That in the event of the failure of such conversations and negotiations to result in the acquisition by the United States in the manner and for the sums above recited, of the territories and cables herein described, the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to negotiate for the prompt settlement, principal and interest, of the debts owed by the said principal allied and associated powers to the United States, and, pending such settlement, to request collateral satisfactory and sufficient as security for said debts.

SEC. 6. That it is the sense of the Congress that such an agreement upon and discharge of the debts of the nations, and, in particular, the satisfaction of the claims of the United States in the manner herein proposed, would be highly promotive of the good will and economic well-being of the peoples and Governments of the principal allied and associated powers and those of the other European countries, and that the United States in entering upon the conversations and negotiations, through the President, with the several Governments herein named, is moved by a desire to have such adjustments made, in order that there may result an associated effort by the enlightened nations in behalf of the backward peoples of the territories affected, to the ends of human welfare and the promotion of the ideals of civilization.

Mr. FRANCE. The territory of the German Empire was in Asia, Africa, and Oceania, the German island possessions alone, particularly those north of the Equator, being, because of their strategic positions near the cable routes and in part interposed between the United States and the Philippines, of great potential importance to the United States and an asset which should not be transferred to a power which may become unfriendly.

Germany possessed the Mariana and Caroline Archipelagoes and 70,000 square miles of northeast New Guinea; the Bismarck Archipelago, 20,000 square miles; the Northern Solomon Islands, 4,200 square miles; and in the Samoan Archipelago she had 9 out of 14 islands.

In Africa she possessed imperial possessions of uncomputed value, embracing an area of 1,032,280 square miles, or about one-third of the United States, made up as follows:

	Square miles.
Kamerun (West Africa)-----	291,950
Togoland (West Africa)-----	33,700
German East Africa-----	384,180
German Southwest Africa-----	322,450
	1,032,280

Much of this territory is very valuable, with highly fertile soil, rich mineral deposits, vast agricultural possibilities, water power, and a salubrious climate.

German Southwest Africa is well watered, has a fine climate, and rich mineral deposits. In the Kamerun are mineral deposits, and there are no doubt valuable deposits of tin, while its coast sections are rich in palm-oil trees, timber, and rubber. Togoland is also extremely valuable for its tropical products, while in German East Africa there may probably be found extensive deposits of coal, gold, copper, and iron.

So great is the value of this African territory that as early as October, 1914, such prominent Englishmen as Sir H. H. Johnston, who is an authority on Africa, advocated England taking this territory, and indeed some of it England seems then to have claimed, what she had conquered there. In addition to this, some English publicists are seriously contending that Great Britain should have the Belgian Congo, embracing 900,000 square miles of the heart of Africa, and in the absence of an affirmative American policy the Kongo may go to Great Britain.

PROPOSED DISPOSITION OF GERMAN COLONIES.

It was decided at the peace conference at Paris that Germany should be deprived of all of her overseas possessions, and in articles 118 to 127 this policy has been embodied in the peace treaty, the principal article being—

Section 1.

GERMAN COLONIES.

Article 119.

Germany renounces in favor of the principal allied and associated powers all her rights and titles over her overseas possessions.

On May 5, 1919, there was made a provisional organization of the League of Nations, and on the following day the so-called council of three—M. Clemenceau, President Wilson, and Lloyd-George—met and decided upon a tentative disposition, subject to the approval and ratification of the League of Nations, of the German colonies as outlined in the official statement as reported as follows. I ask permission to insert that without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The matter referred to is as follows:

Togoland and Kamerun: France and Great Britain shall make a joint recommendation to the League of Nations as to their future.

German East Africa: The mandate shall be held by Great Britain.

German Southwest Africa: The mandate shall be held by the Union of South Africa.

The German Samoan Islands: The mandate shall be held by New Zealand.

The other German Pacific possessions south of the Equator, excluding the German Samoan Islands and Nauru: The mandate shall be held by Australia.

Nauru (Pleasant Island): The mandate shall be given to the British Empire.

The German Pacific islands north of the Equator: The mandate shall be held by Japan.

Mr. FRANCE. This agreement was made subject to ratification by the League of Nations; but when the United States refused to go into the League of Nations there was no guaranty by the United States of these territories which had been acquired by the allied and associated powers jointly as a result of war, and the whole plan seemed to be threatened with disarrangement; but the gentlemen who were favorable to this plan of getting the United States to become one of the guarantors of the titles to these properties, which were acquired during the war as they were disposed to the various countries, now come with a new plan, and this treaty is part of that plan; and under this treaty we assert our acquiescence in the transfer which was tentatively made by those three gentlemen on May 5, 1919, of these islands to Japan. In other words, we are doing here exactly what it was proposed that we should do under the League of Nations so far as the Japanese mandates are concerned; and in passing I want to say that this whole question of mandates is one which should make the statesmen of the world blush with shame, because the nations do not really consider, as has been proven by the acts of the empires since this tentative agreement was made, that these are mandatory territories which they hold in trust. They consider that they own these territories, and their ownership in them is now to be in part guaranteed by the United States.

The positive proof that they do not consider that they hold these territories in trust is the fact that Great Britain, for a consideration, has already ceded to Belgium certain of the territory which was given to her in Africa, which is conclusive proof that Great Britain did not consider that she was holding these territories in trust.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator allow a suggestion there?

Mr. FRANCE. I yield.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. The Senator will remember that by the Berlin treaty of 1878 Austria was given a mandate over Bosnia and Herzegovina. She was to hold them in trust; and that mandate led to the World War, which drew us into its vortex.

Mr. FRANCE. Yes; and I would say to the Senator that if the plan adopted at Washington is ratified by the Senate, we are preparing the world for another war, and I shall prove it before this debate is over, I think, to the satisfaction of the American people.

The American statesmen, following the conference of our Republic with the three great empires at Washington, propose now that we guarantee the title of Japan to all of these islands; for what? In the beginning we asserted that Yap ought to be for America. American statesmanship after the war was so bold as to assert that out of all this vast empire of territory alienated from Germany as a result of war, this great Republic, for all she had sacrificed, should have Yap. It is astonishing, it seems to me, that the representatives of the empires did not see the propriety of transferring Yap and the Yaps to the statesmen of that caliber.

Now, for a mere possible cable landing on Yap, which is of limited value to us, we are to agree to transfer all of those islands north of the Equator to Japan, and, as I will show in a few moments, this cable landing itself is only of value as it supports the cable from Guam to the Philippine Islands. The other cable which I am advocating we seek to acquire extends from Yap to Guam, and from Yap to Celebes, and from Yap to the Orient.

For myself, I do not propose to face the people of the State of Maryland, who expressed their views at the last election on this subject—and ordinarily it is a Democratic State, but it went overwhelmingly Republican last time—after I have voted to ratify, for a mere cable landing on Yap, the title of the Japanese Empire to these islands in the Pacific. I predict that when the United States has become one of the guarantors of Japan's title to these islands—and that is what it really amounts to—the next thing will be to get us to become a guarantor of the title to the islands which have been given to Great Britain south of the Equator, and the next step after that will be to get America to become the guarantor of the title of the former German colonies in Africa, and then the League of Nations plan will be practically complete, and we will have been put into the league, so far as the provisions guaranteeing title to territory are concerned, as effectually as we would have been put into the league under the terms of the treaty of Versailles.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] will later, perhaps, explain in what respect this guaranty under this treaty with Japan is essentially different from the guaranty which we would have given Japan under the terms of the covenant of the League of Nations.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Senator referred to me, and I desire to say that there is no guaranty about it at all. These islands were given to Japan outright by the treaty of Versailles as one of the five principal allied and associated powers. We were another of those allied and associated powers, and we had title to one undivided fifth of all Germany's overseas possessions. Japan now, by the action of the other three powers, has title to four-fifths, and we simply give her our approval for the mandate which she has already received, a separate one on her own account, for our undivided fifth part. There is no guaranty whatever about it.

Mr. FRANCE. I understand the Senator, and I can explain why it is thought to be a guaranty.

Mr. LODGE. Who thinks it is a guaranty?

Mr. FRANCE. The interested parties think it is a guaranty, or they would not seek to have us do this, and I will explain exactly the situation. I must admit, and I will be the first one to admit the great truth, that no guaranty of any world status can be made effective.

Mr. LODGE. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator, but I do not want any misunderstanding of my position. Of course, I deny absolutely and entirely that there is anything resembling a guaranty to anybody in this treaty.

Mr. FRANCE. Of course, it is very clear that the Japanese are getting something for this great generosity to us in giving us a cable landing on Yap.

Mr. LODGE. They are getting our assent to the mandate, to an undivided fifth part; they have title to four-fifths now.

Mr. FRANCE. That is exactly my meaning. I shall show the fallacy of the whole arrangement, the fallacy of the League of Nations arrangement.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. FRANCE. If the Senator will just let me finish this thought, I will be very glad to yield.

The assumption of the great powers was that if they could get the principal great powers at Paris to mutually agree to this disposition of territory it would amount to a guaranty, because nothing but a great power could question the combined power of these other great powers to the territories in question. We are a great power, the greatest of all powers, undoubtedly, and it is assumed that if Great Britain, Japan, France, and the United States agree to the establishment of these mandates it will amount to a guaranty; but the mistake of the men at Paris, as the error of the men at Washington, is made manifest by the fact that, while these are at present the only great powers, so far as their naval preparedness and their military preparedness are concerned, there are other great and potentially greater powers than these who are ready to question, who are now questioning, and who may ultimately question by war, any such agreement as this, and the whole mistake of the Washington conference was in not getting those great powers to come in and consent to an arrangement of all the powers which would establish some rational and just settlement of this whole question of the territories occupied by the backward peoples.

The mistake in Paris was the failure to invite Germany and Russia to participate in that conference, and the mistake in Washington was in the failure to invite Germany and Russia, particularly, and China, to participate in that conference. Let me say that the folly of our Russian policy is proved by the fact that intermeddling and intervention, contrary to the Constitution of the United States, by this country, together with the other powers, have resulted in the militarization of Russia. The policy of intermeddling in China is resulting in the militarization of China, and Germany is already militarized, in my judgment, to a more dangerous degree than she was before 1914, if we confine that statement to the spiritual sense. I think, perhaps, in 1914, 3 per cent of the Germans would have wished for war. To-day I believe 97 per cent of the Germans, while they have not rifles on their shoulders, have a hatred, a rankling sense of injustice, in their hearts, which is even more dangerous, perhaps, than military preparedness in the mere physical sense.

The Senator from Georgia has left the Chamber, and I regret it, because I had intended to yield to him.

Mr. KING. May I interrupt the Senator for a moment?

Mr. FRANCE. I yield.

Mr. KING. I beg to suggest to the Senator that, in my opinion, if I interpret his statement correctly, he places too much stress upon the character of title that was given to the mandates over or in relation to the mandated territories. It seems to me that the proper interpretation of the Versailles treaty is that those territories which were named as mandates did not obtain what might be denominated a fee simple title to the mandated territories, but they obtained merely trusteeships, and that Great Britain should cede to Belgium, as the Senator said a moment ago, some of the territory over which she had a mandate, Belgium would take it subject to the limitations which Great Britain had, and Belgium would be compelled to account to the League of Nations for her trusteeship, and would be amenable to the League of Nations for her trusteeship, and would be amenable to the determination which would be made by the League with respect to her trusteeship.

Mr. FRANCE. The Senator has raised an interesting legal point, but, as a matter of fact, these mandates were held by these nations under the League of Nations presumably as trustees, and if they considered that they held these territories as trustees, it is to be presumed that they would have gone to those who created the trust to gain consent for the alienation. The Senator is too good a lawyer to defend the proposition that a trustee, without the consent of the courts or without the consent of those for whom the trust is held, can alienate property simply because the one who purchases the property will be presumed to purchase subject to the trust, to be held as a trust, as it would have been held by the trustee. The Senator would not defend that proposition.

Mr. KING. If I understand the Senator, I think I am in accord with him, and that is one of my objections to this treaty. Whether it would prove an insuperable objection to my voting for ratification I express no opinion, but I do feel that our Government, before yielding or ceding—if that is the purpose of this treaty—its undivided one-fifth interest in and to the island of Yap, as the Senator from Massachusetts denominated it, ought to have presented its contentions or its claims to the League of Nations, to determine whether or not that supervisory organization assented to our alienation of a right, if we had a right there, which we held subject to the League of Nations and subject to the surveillance and supervisory control of the League of Nations.

Mr. FRANCE. The Senator's position is perfectly sound. It would be much better for us to give practical guaranties of these territories under the protection of the league than it would be for us to give those guaranties under separate treaties, for while we are not in the league we can not invoke the assistance of the league, which provided a procedure in case of controversy. So it seems that the Democrats are perfectly consistent in their position in being for a League of Nations, and in being opposed to our doing individually and separately what the nations of the league proposed to do collectively. We are assuming obligations which we would have assumed under the league, but we have not the protection which membership in the league would have given us. So the proposition is really a less defensible one than the League of Nations proposition, but it was assumed that a League of Nations was impossible so far as any participation by the United States in it was concerned, and that the only way to get us to assent to the transference of these territories was for us to be persuaded to do it separately instead of as a member of the league.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President—

Mr. FRANCE. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have been endeavoring to follow the argument of the Senator and have found it exceedingly interesting. I was interested particularly in that portion of his objection which was founded upon the nonparticipation of Germany in the conference at Washington. Inasmuch as Germany by the treaty of Versailles surrendered all of her interest in these islands to the five powers, she would not have anything to say about that, would she? Is it not a fact that the Senator's objection goes to the disposition made by the treaty of Versailles rather than to this treaty? Is not the Senator complaining, as I understand him, that Germany was forced by the treaty of Versailles to give up her interest in these islands?

Mr. FRANCE. I would say to the Senator that I am not objecting to the disposition of the territory at all, nor to its alienation from Germany.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If that is the case, if Germany has surrendered all of her interest in them by the treaty of Versailles, as she did, and that is accepted, what difference if she were right here? She would not have anything at all to say about it.

Mr. FRANCE. I would say to the Senator that my argument that Russia and Germany should have participated in the Washington conference was not based upon that consideration to which he calls attention. I am persuaded that if those nations had been present at the conference a totally different arrangement would have been made; in other words, the conference would not have been at all what it was. We should not have had this kind of conference at all. We should have had what I have been advocating practically since January, 1919, a conference of all the powers which would deal with economic questions, settling them satisfactorily on the theory that the political questions would settle themselves when the economic questions had been adjusted.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am disposed to agree with the Senator in that view, but I was endeavoring to follow the argument to make it applicable to the matter that is exactly before us.

Mr. FRANCE. The Senator's point is perfectly well made in that particular.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Then, assuming that Germany has no interest in the thing at all, and these islands belong to the five powers, and that Japan exercises the mandate over them by virtue of the concession then by the four powers and now by the United States, they belong, as said by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Lodge], to the extent of one-fifth to the United States and the other four-fifths to the other four powers. They have all now agreed that Japan shall exercise governmental control. Now, where does the guaranty come in of which the Senator speaks? I can not follow that. They belong to us and we have accepted the concession under the treaty with Germany by taking all the benefits accruing to us under the treaty of Versailles, including our one-fifth interest in these islands. How do we guarantee anything and to whom do we guarantee it?

Mr. FRANCE. Of course, in a legal sense I am not contending that a release is the same as a guaranty. This is a release, but it is more than that, in my judgment. It amounts to our acquiescence in the former settlement which was made, let it be remembered, not by the disarmament conference at Washington but by President Wilson tentatively at Paris.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is what I understand the Senator is complaining of.

Mr. FRANCE. And this is a ratification not of the act of the disarmament conference but it is a ratification of the agreement entered into by President Wilson with Clemenceau and Lloyd-George at Paris.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Now the Senator is perfectly logical. I understand he is attacking the Versailles arrangement and not the Washington arrangement.

Mr. FRANCE. I am glad now to yield to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. Watson], if he desires to ask a question.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. The time has passed. I will not intrude upon the Senator.

Mr. FRANCE. I am very sorry.

Now, I desire to discuss a slightly different aspect of the whole question, and what I think to be a somewhat important aspect.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FRANCE. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I was not in the Chamber when the Senator commenced, and he may have made this point clear. Before he leaves this particular aspect I would like to ask him a question or two. Does the Senator contend, as a matter of international law, that the treaty now before us is one that the parties who make it have no right to make because of their lack of title to the property involved?

Mr. FRANCE. I would say in response to the Senator that a discussion of the question as to the title of nations to countries would lead us far afield. There is but one title which one country has to another country, and that is the title which rests upon military force. The empire holds its territory because it is strong enough to hold it, and there is no other, so far as know, in international law to the territory held by an empire.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not seeking to raise that point. Perhaps the Senator did not understand me, or I may not have made my question clear. The idea entered my mind from listening to the Senator that while Germany had by the treaty of Versailles surrendered to the five powers all her rights to these islands, we, not being a party to that treaty, had the same right as any other one power to say what should be done with those islands that had been ceded to us by Germany. The other four powers got together and decided among themselves that Japan shall be given a mandatory privilege over them to govern them.

This treaty comes before the Senate between us and Japan alone, and proposes that we shall give our consent to that mandate for certain concessions that are given to us in the island of Yap. I think there might be a technical legal objection made to that, because it could be said, perhaps, that the other three powers outside of Japan might object to the concessions which were given to us by Japan, because Japan has no right there except to govern the island under the mandate given her by the League of Nations. She has not any title. It is not her Government. She is just a trustee carrying out a mandate, as I understand it.

Then there was another thing that entered into it which it seems to me might raise a close legal proposition. I think of it because the Senator's argument called it to my attention when he said that Russia ought to have been here in order to make this agreement perfect. At the beginning of the war and, in fact, throughout most of the war Russia was one of the powers that helped to fight Germany. She lost more men than any other one nation. She did great work in that war. While Russia was out of it at the end of the war, the Allies received the benefit of the sacrifices Russia made during the war. Russia was never consulted, either at Versailles or at Washington. It seemed to me there might be a technical reason why Russia would not have the right to say, "We were part of this war and an important part, and one of the Allies, and you can not dispose of anything that you took away from Germany without you consult us."

Mr. FRANCE. Russia has already, I believe, if we may rely upon newspaper reports, stated that she would be bound by none of these arrangements.

Mr. NORRIS. Even though that were true, is that any reason why we should reject the treaty, knowing the imperfection, if I may put it that way, of the title that we do get for whatever we get? I am inclined to concede, as a matter of international law and of real justice, that there is an imperfection in our title as well as one in Japan's title. We do not take any greater title than is owned by the power that conveys it to us, and we do that knowingly. If that does not give us an absolute title, we take it with whatever imperfection there is in it. Knowing what the facts are, as we all must, is that any reason why we should reject the treaty?

Mr. FRANCE. Upon that general question I would say that we may consider that there are two forms of title to territory. There is imperial title which rests upon force, and there is the moral title which rests upon reason and justice. Germany had imperial title to these territories. She conferred imperial title, if I may use the term, upon the allied and associated powers, of which we were one. That title was good because those powers were strong enough to make it good. When those powers were ready to transfer those territories one to the other, they were strong enough to do that, and the title which had been obtained and conferred was a title which rests upon might. President Wilson advocated a totally different policy, a policy based upon the theory, the American theory, I would say, that peoples should not be passed about from sovereignty to sovereignty without their consent. In other words, that sort of doctrine of course looked to what may be considered the moral title resting upon morality and justice.

The utter futility of the whole Washington conference will begin to appear when we, as the Senate, seriously settle ourselves to a consideration of the very great problems growing out of the war which now confront us, problems which must find a very prompt solution if the disorganization which now prevails in the industrial, commercial, and financial life of this country and that of the world is not to grow steadily worse.

Mr. President, the very perplexing problems which now confront us, and that of a cash bonus for our ex-service men is one of them, are in large part due to the failure of the Congress at the close of the war to formulate policies comprehensive enough to meet the complexities and difficulties of the tremendous situation in which we found ourselves after the signing of the armistice.

We had a disordered and a disorganized world to deal with and we sought to apply measures of relief which were wholly inadequate. We failed, as did all the parliaments of the world, to begin at once the application of principles and policies looking to the reconciliation of all the peoples of the world and to the reorganization and reconstruction of a broken and disordered economic system.

The backward-looking elderly statesmen of a passing age who met at Paris ignored the fundamental truth, dimly perceived before the war, made apparent during the conflict, and fully demonstrated during the last destructive years, which should have been the reconstruction period, that the civilized world is an economic unity, a living organism, of which each of the various countries is a vital and indispensable organ, and that there can be no general well-being throughout the whole unless there be health and vigor in every part. There must be a peaceful and plentiful production of the commodities and necessities for civilized life in every country and the normal unclogged circulation of these commodities in the arteries of commerce which bind the nations into a functioning whole. This great truth the peacemakers at Paris disregarded when they imposed upon Germany impossible reparations, when they destroyed the economic unity of the Austrian-Hungarian federation, when they failed to formulate plans for the economic restoration of Russia, Poland, Lithuania, Latvia, Estonia, Turkey, Greece, and the lesser countries; when, in short, they failed to inaugurate measures looking to a more abundant world commerce in commodities, to a wider extension of the boundaries of civilization, and to an enormous increase in the productive power of the world for the purpose of creating a better and more rational, international, economic structure to replace the one destroyed by war.

The task was not too difficult. On every hand were the ready materials for such a creation of a more stable and prosperous condition, but prejudice, passionate hatreds, and imperial greeds, the cruel emotions which had all but destroyed the world, prevented their utilization. Millions of bleeding, broken hearts in every land were acquiescent to such a plan; but reactionary, blind, Bourbon statesmen, who refused to heed the lesson which was perhaps intended to be taught by God through this most awful scourge of war, stubbornly, stupidly blocked the way onward toward the realization of the reawakened hopes and aspirations of mankind.

THE QUESTION OF THE BONUS.

Let us be fair, honest, and frank while we ask ourselves the question why a considerable number of those heroic men who made up the invincible armies of our country, men more free from mercenary motives than any body of men which could be marshaled in all the world, are now asking for a bonus as a recognition of their services in war for the preservation of institutions of liberty. These men have never been and are not now mercenary. They sought to drive no hard bargain when their country called. They were not mercenary when they gladly offered to place all that they held most precious, even life, upon the altar of their country. They were not mercenary when they embarked on transports calmly to brave the peril of the cruel submarine. They were not mercenary when they stood a solid phalanx against all the terrible onslaughts of the enemy. They were not mercenary when, an invincible host, they launched that desperate charge, the most valorous in all the military annals of mankind, and when with thinner ranks, with uniforms stained with the blood and mire of conflict, they bivouacked beneath the stars of France, but yet under their own banners rebaptized with sacrifice, bathed in a new light, resplendent with a glorious victory. They were not mercenary when with their hearts sad and sorrowing for their dead and wounded, but rejoicing with the glad expectation of reunion with those they loved, they embarked for home. What did they ask when their feet touched the soil of the cherished homeland? They asked but these two things: First, that their disabled and diseased ones should be cared for tenderly and generously by a grateful country; and second, that those in health should be given opportunity for useful and profitable employment in which they might further serve their country and the world.

Unfortunately, these two requests of theirs could meet with no instant acquiescence: The first appropriations for hospitals, for vocational training, and for the payment of compensation to the wounded were wholly inadequate. This fact, of course, has been testified to by the Committee of Senators who made the investigation as to the hospital facilities available, of which committee my distinguished colleague from Maryland [Mr. WELLER] was one of the able members.

The continued unemployment of many of those who were able to work was the result of the unwise and destructive treaty at Paris and the failure of America to assert herself in wise leadership toward the adoption of rational, courageous, and comprehensive policies for the economic reconstruction of the world. The first appeal for the bonus came from the disabled who were improperly compensated, and later those who were unemployed called attention to their necessities. We must remember that it was a sense of injustice rankling deep in their hearts which started the appeal for aid. There were also the contributing factors, their realization that profiteering had been carried on at home and their conviction that while they had bared their breasts to fight the enemy of liberty there in France we, their representatives, had failed faithfully to hold the lines for liberty here at home. As they went to foreign fields to battle for its protection, they had a right to expect of us that we would stand manfully here for the preservation of liberty against the day of their return. They return and find absolute freedom of speech and discussion and many of the principal pillars of free government thrown down. They find repressive and restrictive statutes everywhere; they find the framework of free government mutilated by the building into it of a prohibitive statute, not an amendment of the framework of government enlarging the powers of people over their own affairs but a statute called the eighteenth amendment which impairs popular sovereignty and makes possible the vicious system of government by minority.

The invasion of the people's liberties; the impairment of popular sovereignty; the virtual destruction of representative government by the abdication by Congress of its functions; the enormous, swollen, unhealthful growth of Executive power; the creation of a huge, wasteful, autocratic, bureaucratic government at Washington, with its thousands of too often mercenary and corrupt spies swarming through the States, all of which occurred during the war, and the failure to avoid the economic crisis which has caused the unemployment of millions of men, agricultural depression, industrial paralysis, and social unrest during the reconstruction period—these are some of the factors which have caused a widespread discontent.

I am asking for a fair hearing for my plan, which proposes that we accept from the former allied and associated powers their share in the formerly owned German cables and colonies transferred to them under the terms of the Paris treaty in payment of the huge debts of those powers to us. It is a plan for the liquidation of troublesome international obligations which are preventing the rehabilitation of Europe and of the world. This plan would give us vast assets for slow if not worthless paper. You will see by a glance at the maps upon the wall, particularly this one [indicating], that these colonies constitute a great territory, approximating one-third of the area of the United States. Here are huge storehouses of undeveloped natural wealth—palm oil, rare woods, gold, copper, iron, rubber, tin, lead, diamonds, ivory, and probably large undiscovered reservoirs of oil, which, by the way, is not an unimportant subject when we recall that it has been estimated by the Geological Survey that the United States has oil enough only to last her for 17 years. Here are great tracts of land suitable for homestead development, agriculture, and the extension of the commerce of the United States. The formerly owned German cables you will see indicated upon the maps in red. They cross the Atlantic; they go down the European coast along Africa to all the African colonies; thence over to South America, and from Guam to Yap and from Yap to the Orient, the Philippines, and the South Sea islands. If we acquired them, they would afford us an uncensored means of communication with the Orient and prompt and profitable contact with Europe and Africa. The vast resources which we would thus acquire would meet the reasonable demands of our people for a settlement of the obligations of the allied nations to us and the transaction bring about a situation which would enable us to not only meet our legitimate obligations but to also render an invaluable service to the world.

I propose this plan because I am convinced that it would be unwise and dangerous for us to attempt to put further strain upon our financial system by attempting to pay a cash bonus of from three to five billions of dollars before at least attempting to find a solution for the problem of our agricultural, industrial, commercial, and financial depression, now a cause for deep concern.

OUR BUSINESS DEPRESSION.

In considering this question of the bonus it would be hazardous for us to close our eyes to the fact that we are now in and are moving toward an even more serious condition of agricultural, industrial, commercial, and financial depression and unemployment. Our banks, particularly in the grain and cotton States, and those in the large industrial centers, are filled with frozen assets due to the inability of the cotton planters, of the grain farmers, and of the manufacturers to liquidate their obligations because of their inability to sell the products upon which these bank credits are based. Due to this situation, there have been most serious failures in the Southwest, in the Northwest, in the Central West, and also in the eastern industrial cities. In the absence of radical measures for the relief of these conditions other failures would seem to be inevitable. The unemployment has reached most serious proportions. It was estimated that from four to six millions of men were out of work during the autumn months, and the condition has certainly not improved. There can be no doubt that in the absence of comprehensive relief, which must be based upon a clear understanding of the fundamental reason of the condition, we must look for a serious situation, if not actual panic, in the spring or early summer. The crisis might well be precipitated by the bankruptcy of Germany, which might follow a further attempt to make reparation payments which she is not strong enough to make.

CAUSE OF OUR BUSINESS DEPRESSION.

The cause of our business depression is to be found in the conditions which prevail in Europe. The failure of most of the Governments of Europe to balance their budgets, the overproduction of money by inflation, the piling up of enormous governmental expenditures, taxation, and debts, the existence of huge outstanding international obligations, the vain efforts of the Germans to pay impossible reparations, the prostration of Russia, the great nutritive organ of Europe, the food producer which has been called the trunk of the tree of Europe, the world-wide underproduction and faulty distribution of goods, and the huge indebtedness of Europe to us—these are some of the factors which are adversely affecting conditions here and which are inviting the world-wide disaster which will follow the further breakdown of the economic international structure.

Cecil Rhodes, the great empire builder, once said that "goods constituted civilization." His epigram, "Civilization is goods," contains a profound truth. If the statesmen of the world could firmly grasp this golden key of truth, that "civilization is goods," and that civilization is now in danger because the world is so desperately short of goods, they could unlock the iron gates of unhappy circumstance which bar the way onward toward the preservation and fuller realization of civilization and the permanent peace and the enlarging prosperity of the world.

Through four long years of blood, millions of men have been drawn from the peaceful and plentiful production of the necessities and commodities of civilized life. With concentrated furious energy these millions were inventing, building, and using gigantic engines and organizations for destruction. Unspeakable havoc has been wrought in all our agricultural, financial, commercial, industrial, and transportation processes. Vast reaches of once populous and fertile earth have been devastated. Powerful, well-integrated Governments have been weakened, dissolved, or disintegrated. The process of dissolution tends to spread. Agony breeds anarchy.

Starving peoples can not be held in stable governments. Not agitations, but unfavorable conditions, invite the anarchy which, like an insidious, contagious, cancerous disease, threatens to break down the tissue of all governments. Civilization depends not only upon goods, but upon the credit which makes the production of goods possible, and when we say that civilization is bleeding to whiteness and to weakness in Europe we mean that the frightful deficits shown by the European budgets, which are being met by inflation, by the printing of more money, are draining and weakening the credit systems of the world.

We dare not, if we are to be faithful in the fulfillment of our obligations to the heroic men who preserved for us our institutions, to the millions of unemployed workers, to our farmers and manufacturers, to our business men, and to all the people, permit a further drain from the world's severed arteries of credit through which the economic strength of the world is wasting, as we would do by now passing the proposed bonus legislation before we have checked this progressive malady of credit depletion by tying the arteries and closing the gaping wounds suffered by the world in war.

Our great industrial expansion activity and prosperity during and immediately after the war were due to our enormous export trade. With the collapse of our export trade we suffered an industrial paralysis and a grave depression in every line of business. In 1920 our exports were $8,228,016,307, while in 1921 they were $4,485,122,696, a loss in export trade of $3,742,893,611. This huge sum representing our loss in trade would be sufficient to pay 4,000,000 men a wage of $70 a month each for a year. It is not strange that in 1921 we had from four to six millions of men unemployed, and that many ex-service men suffered acute distress. This decline in our export trade occurred when Europe desperately needed for reconstruction all that we could ship in food and commodities, but Europe could not buy because of the huge debts to us, totaling in Government obligations and open accounts much more than $15,000,000,000.

Unless some way can be found to liquidate Europe's debt to us so Europe can buy from us, our business can not revive, the exchange situation can not be cured, the budgets of European countries can not be brought to balance, and the shortage of food, raw products, and manufactured goods in Europe will cause acute distress, disturbances, and a further disintegration of the social and economic structure of the world.

Here is a most important point, for few seem to realize that a world-wide shortage of food is imminent if we do not restore the vigorous flow of commodities in the arteries of international commerce. Note the alarming facts that in 1910 Russia exported to the world over 225,000,000 bushels of grain, enough to supply with bread for a year 45,000,000 people in the industrial countries. In 1913 Russia exported 122,000,000 bushels, in 1915, 7,000,000 bushels, and now she requires at once for import about 60,000,000 bushels to feed her people and seed a small portion of her tillable land.

Why, Senators, stop for a moment and realize the fact that there are more than 45,000,000 people in the industrial countries of Europe whose living or dying must depend upon whether Russia and the United States, and to a lesser degree Argentine and Rumania, can export to them grain for their daily bread; and consider further the alarming fact that before the war the people of Europe generally were not overfed—indeed, in Germany and the other industrial countries the standard of living was not high—and then consider the further fact that now, in the absence of the exportation of grain from Russia, many of these people are almost certainly doomed to malnutrition, if not to actual starvation.

The exports of wheat from the United States have been declining, and because of the demoralized prices, which have more recently somewhat recovered, western farmers are now planning to reduce their crops 12 per cent next year. Millions in Russia are famishing, millions of Germans are suffering slow starvation, and there is undernourishment or starvation in many other lands. Forty millions of people who live in the industrial countries, I repeat, must depend for food on exports from Russia and the United States. The ominous strikes in Germany, which are the beginning of a total breakdown of the social, economic, and financial structure of Germany, are the result of hunger, and they must grow to serious disturbances unless Germany can import more food.

With the peoples of the world desperately needing food and all of the manufactured articles of civilized life, there can be no fundamental cause for financial, industrial, and agricultural depression. It is true that there are places, and the United States is one, of surplus of productive power and of superabundance of commodities and food, but against these there are other places of desperate and imperative need. How long shall the statesmen of America and of the world be able to maintain their power if they continue to declare that there is no way to send the surplus to supply the need?

The farmers of the West, the cotton growers of the South, and the woolgrowers of the West are beginning to question the validity of a system under which they can not sell their grains and their cotton and their wool when the people of Europe are starving and suffering death from freezing for lack of the very food and clothing which could have been made from these surplus raw products which are a drag upon the market here. The industrial workers of America, sitting in their cold houses, are beginning to question the validity of a system under which the great industries of America are in part closed down when they know there are millions of people in Europe suffering death from lack of the very materials that these industries might be supplying.

Mr. KING. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. FRANCE. I yield.

Mr. KING. Before he concludes, I hope the Senator will elucidate the subject which he discussed a moment ago, which is profoundly interesting, namely, that the United States has a great surplus not only of raw materials—wool, cotton, copper, and so forth—but finished products, and that if our prosperity is to be regained, it will be regained by reason of finding a foreign market for our goods.

I call the Senator's attention to the fact that there are statesmen from this Chamber and from the other end of the Capitol now engaged in formulating a plan which, if we are to believe the newspapers, is calculated to absolutely prohibit exports from the United States, because that plan would deny to those who are freezing and starving, and who need these surplus products, any possibility of paying for them. It would erect a wall so high that the Chinese wall, of which we speak, would be insignificant in comparison with it. I hope the Senator will point out the policy which he thinks we should adopt to facilitate the exchange of commodities, as a result of which there will come increased vitality and vigor to our industrial and economic life, and at the same time bring happiness and prosperity to other nations.

Mr. FRANCE. The Senator is referring to the fact that those countries must pay us with goods, which can not be imported here because of our proposed tariffs.

Mr. KING. Absolutely.

Mr. FRANCE. Of course, it is a very strange thing that so many men who call themselves statesmen are not able to think out the simplest problems. As a matter of fact, it soon was discovered that Germany must pay her reparations not in gold but in goods. The statesmen never thought of that, although it is a fundamental economic proposition. Germany had only $260,000,000 worth of gold, and it was necessary, if she paid her reparations, to pay them in goods. I happened to be sitting in the visitors' gallery of the House of Commons, in England, when the House of Commons adopted an antidumping bill to prevent the Germans from paying any indemnity to Great Britain in goods; and the French did not want the Germans to pay them in goods; they did not care to have them pay even in material for the rebuilding of their houses, upon which labor had been performed; and when the Germans offered to pay the reparations for the destruction of ships in tonnage of ships, of course, the British workmen protested most strenuously against a policy which would have thrown them all out of work.

The Senator's question is a very appropriate one, and I will touch upon it a little more fully in a few moments—the question as to how the allied Governments are to pay the principal and interest of their debts to us.

ECONOMIC CONFERENCE NEEDED.

While the countries of Europe are facing great perplexities, a careful investigation must disclose the fact that the countries of Europe are, if we regard the fundamentals of human nature, moral, solvent, and sound. The ultimate basis of credit rests upon a faith in the moral nature of men, in their desire and capacity for production, and in the adequate resources of the earth. Men, except a negligible proportion, can be expected to pay for what they buy and they can buy when they produce and produce when they can buy.

While it is not safe for us to pass legislation granting a cash bonus for the relief of our ex-soldiers, many of whom are suffering real distress, in our present situation, I must insist that it is also not safe for us to sit here closing our eyes to the perils of our position, refusing to apply the efficient remedies either because we do not see them or because their application in the interests of all the people might upset some of the sinister schemes of a few, here in our own country or there in other nations, who are playing a deep game to accomplish purposes of their own. Before proceeding with the discussion of the plan I propose for the liquidation of the debt of the allied and associated powers to us, which was presented many months ago, which plan also calls for a reduction in the German reparations, I desire to mention two other necessary measures which must be adopted before there can be a solution for our problems—the calling by the United States of an international economic conference, which I have been urging since January, 1919, to which all of the nations signatory of or inherent to the convention for the pacific settlement of international disputes of July 24, 1899, would be invited, and the adoption of a policy, which I have been urging since February, 1920, looking to our reconciliation with and the restoration of Russia.

I would say merely in passing that my contention in 1919 and 1920 that the protection of the foreign trade of the United States and the prevention of a collapse in our exports were indispensable if we were to avoid agricultural, industrial, and commercial depression has been borne out by the recent developments in the grain markets. It is the unsalable surplus that breaks the prices of the farmers' products.

The Senator from Nebraska is before me, and I am reminded of his great fight here in the Senate for a measure based upon that contention—that it was the unsalable surplus that broke the price, and that means should be found for the selling of that unsalable surplus to the starving peoples of Europe. It was a constructive measure, which should have been passed, in my judgment, although I do not know all the details of the measure, as it was presented during my absence from the Senate. Often the absorption of a relatively small surplus by the opening up of a new market is sufficient to cause a rapid advance in price. The entrance of the Government into the market to purchase $30,000,000 worth of grain has been one of the contributing factors in the recent spectacular rise in grain prices. The bill to appropriate $20,000,000 to purchase these grains for Russia passed in the third week of December last, and since the 3d day of January the wheat market has rallied from $1.08 to $1.42, corn from 52 cents to 62½ cents, and oats from 37 cents to 42 cents. It will be seen, therefore, that this relief work for Russia has materially relieved the American farmer.

THE PROBLEM OF THE WORLD'S DEBTS.

It is important to clearly understand the true fundamental causes for the world's economic disorganization and then to consider the remedies which might be applied for their cure. The world's debts are causing the world's disorders. These debts can be divided for convenience into the total debts of all of the countries and the international debts or obligations owed by certain of the countries to certain of the other countries of the world.

At the beginning of the war the total debts of all of the countries of the world amounted to approximately $45,000,000,000. Now the debts of the countries amount to the inconceivable and staggering total of over $265,000,000,000. It must be apparent that many of the nations of the world must become insolvent under such a crushing load of debt unless means are found for the increasing of national incomes, the elimination of deficits, and the balancing of budgets.

The annual interest charge upon this huge debt of the world is approximately $9,000,000,000. To meet the principal and interest of this debt makes necessary a total increase in the world's sources of revenue. Taxation to meet the increase of governmental expense must be levied against a much greater total of productive and consumptive power. More men in the world must become producers and more must become consumers of goods. This means that the boundaries of civilization must be greatly extended. In other words, there must be international cooperation on the part of advanced nations for the rational, practical, and humane development of the world's vast resources of energy and productive power and of its largely unused natural wealth. International cooperation would find vast virgin fields for helpful endeavor in upbuilding and developing Russia, China, Africa, and other less important but extensive backward portions of the world.

Then we have the international debts or obligations of certain of the nations to certain of the other nations, which outstanding obligations, as I have indicated, are preventing the normal circulation of goods between the countries which is so indispensable to the welfare of the world. The debts owed by Russia and the countries disannexed from Russia to the other countries, particularly to France, have contributed, because of their effect upon international policy, to the continued prostration of Russia and the demoralization of Europe. Russia is potentially the richest and most solvent country of the world, and her outstanding obligations can and will, I believe, be met if a proper policy toward Russia is adopted. The funding, the recognition, and the payment of interest on the Russian debt would enormously relieve France, and France would be put in a position to relax her demands for impossible reparations from Germany; and this, if properly carried out, would make possible the recovery of industrial Germany, the dynamo which drives the economic machinery of Europe. If, however, France is to modify the reparations demanded from Germany, France as well as the other allied powers must be relieved of some or all of the burdens of their debts to the United States.

CAN EUROPE PAY DEBTS TO US?

I was opposed to the bill recently passed by the Congress to appoint a commission with the power to adjust by some sort of funding the debts of certain of the allied and associated powers to the United States. The delegation by the Congress to commissions of legislative, executive, and judicial powers is a vicious practice and one which, if continued, must ultimately destroy our institutions. All thoughtful and understanding students of the spirit and mechanism of our Government, with its well-designed system of checks and balances, should look with disfavor upon such legislation. If there ever was a question which should be settled by the Representatives of the people, it is such a question as this, which involves not only the question of revenue, which has a direct bearing upon the taxation which must be levied upon the people, but which may even carry with it the momentous issues of peace and war. Moreover, I am convinced that the international bankers, who were the moving spirits back of this legislation, did not offer it in good faith. I have discussed this question of the debts owed by certain of the nations to certain of the other nations and by the formerly allied and associated powers to the United States with leading economists and financiers of our country and I have yet to meet one who believes that these obligations can be met by the ordinary means of payment. Those who voted for the bill authorizing the commission to fund the debts owing by these powers to the United States with the hope that a bonus could be met out of what France and England can pay on their obligations have not considered the elementary facts of the world's economic situation. How can Europe pay her debts to us? Can we trade as usual with Europe, and can Europe send us in addition one-half a billion dollars of gold annually to pay the interest on these debts of the European countries to us? It is impossible. The present gold reserve of the United States is in excess of $3,000,000,000; England has but $763,749,000, France $690,158,000, and Italy $209,698,000 in gold; all of these countries together having gold little in excess of one-half of our gold reserve.

If the European countries begin paying us this interest on their debt in gold, in less than three years we would drain from Europe every ounce and grain of gold. Germany has but $236,698,000 in gold. Germany's reparations, the debts of the European countries to us, all of these international obligations, which are the fundamental causes of the demoralization of our exchanges and of international trade, must be liquidated otherwise than with gold. The annual production of gold in the world is estimated at $300,000,000, and gold production in the world is tending to decline because of adverse conditions surrounding the mining industry. The distinguished junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. Odell], who is an authority upon this subject, has presented to the Senate and to the country this serious aspect of the problem.

I ask that the article may be inserted at the close of my remarks as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. FRANCE. What I have long contended—that it would be ruinous to England and to France and injurious to ourselves if France or England should attempt to pay their indebtedness to our Government in gold—is now becoming evident to all. England is financially the stronger, but an attempt on her part to pay the interest or principal of this debt in gold would drive down the pound sterling to a ruinous figure, making it increasingly difficult for England to import needed foods and raw products from us; would tend to close down her industries and cause an increase of unemployment which might lead to serious social disturbances. If we do not accept payment in gold, can we accept payment in goods? Can we increase the importation of goods from Europe over and above our ordinary importations to the amount of $500,000,000 each year without seriously disturbing our industries and disorganizing our whole taxation system? Or can we import from Europe in normal quantities and decrease our exports in the amount of $500,000,000 each year without crippling our industries? For them to pay in gold would be to destroy their industries, while for them to pay in goods would be to disorganize ours. Two remedies have been proposed for the settlement of the debt of the allied nations to us, one of which remedies is too strong to be taken and the other of which is no remedy at all.

I refer to outright cancellation of the allied debt, which is impossible because it would ruin any political party proposing it, and the funding of the principal of the allied debt into long-time obligations and the deferment of interest payments, which is almost as unpopular as outright cancellation, while at the same time it is no remedy whatever, since the allied Governments would remain indebted to us, interest payments would become necessary, and the fundamental cause of the difficulty would persist. Moreover, antagonism and open hostility between the allied nations as debtors and ourselves as creditor would be unavoidable. I foresee that such an arrangement must lead to constant political agitation, international misunderstanding, contention, and possibly war. It would be ruinous to let them pay, cancellation is impossible, and we can not afford to have our former associated nations hopelessly in our debt. These propositions appear to me to be self-evident truths.

LIQUIDATE DEBTS, INCREASE OUR RESOURCES, AND EXTEND CIVILIZATION.

I repeat that before there can be a rehabilitation of our national, international, economic structures, we must find a way to largely decrease or liquidate all of these international obligations and to increase the total income of the world in order that the total increased obligations of the countries incurred by war may not force important nations to the policy of repudiation. It is most desirable that America should assert her leadership in the calling of an international conference for the consideration of these questions. The resolution, Senate joint resolution 11, which I am discussing to-day, and which I asked at the beginning of my remarks to have printed as a part of my remarks, proposes that the President of the United States undertake negotiations for the purchase, giving credit on the debts of the formerly allied and associated powers to the United States for the amount of the purchase price, of the territories in East, Southwest, and West Africa and in Oceania over which Germany exercised sovereignty prior to the war and the cables surrendered under article 244, Annex VII, of the Versailles treaty.

It would further authorize the President to enter upon the negotiation of a treaty of international comity, commerce, and cooperation with the allied and associated powers looking to the development of the human and natural resources of Africa; to urge the fixing by the allied and associated powers of a just and reasonable indemnity to be paid by Germany to said powers. This plan would not only result in a liquidation of the debts which the formerly allied and associated powers owe us, but it would give us valuable assets instead of slow if not worthless paper, and it would make possible the cooperation of the great advanced nations, under the leadership of America, the great missionary Nation, in the better organization, education, evangelization, and the civilization of the peoples of the yet dark continent of Africa. Great opportunities for trade, profitable to American merchants, would be open. The growth in the commerce to those portions of Africa, which since 1898 have been touched by civilization, has been phenomenal.

I indicate the colonies as laid down upon the map of the United States. I indicate again the colonies as they are in Africa and as they would appear in their territorial extent if laid down upon the United States. At another point upon the map I have indicated the cables which, if they were acquired, would give us an unmolested means of communication to Europe and Africa and also to the Orient, for Senators will perceive that under the pending treaty we have no adequate direct communication with Japan and China, these cables, being the former German cables, not having been transferred with the island of Yap to the United States. It is a very serious thing, particularly if we are going into any guaranty of conditions in the Far East, that we by the acquisition of this German cable at least should have a further direct means of communication from the United States to China and Japan. The importance of the island of Yap ceases to appeal to us when we realize that we can only communicate through Yap over cables which were of former German ownership and which are now owned by the allied and associated powers.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FRANCE. Certainly.

Mr. KING. The statement made by the Senator with reference to the possibility of obtaining trade in Africa is, I confess, rather novel to me. I had supposed, and I fancy that is the view of most Americans, that Great Britain in her colonies, and Belgium and France in their colonies in Africa, were so thoroughly entrenched, that their credit system was so regnant in those territories where they are supreme politically, that it would give them such economic advantages that it would be practically impossible for our country, with our lack of foreign avenues for trade, our lack of business men who might do so, to go out into those countries and deal with the people as the residents and business men of those countries that dominate them can do, so that we would be deterred if not prevented from getting any foothold in obtaining any trade in those countries. If I am in error, I should be glad to get the view of the Senator.

Mr. FRANCE. I regret that I have not with me the figures showing our trade with certain of the colonies of Africa. We have, as a matter of fact, carried on a quite considerable amount of trade, relatively small it is true, but still quite a considerable amount of trade with South Africa. Of course, in considering the whole question of trade we must remember that trade is always reciprocal, as the Senator well knows, as indicated by his question. The very fact that we take rubber from Africa, and a large part of the rubber which we take is taken from Africa, is proof positive that ultimately our goods are reaching Africa in payment for that rubber; that is to say, to the extent that the rubber is a cultivated product. Of course, there has been a great amount of vandalism in Africa. By that I mean the stripping and destruction of rubber trees and the exportation of rubber for which no commensurate return has been made. But even in those colonies the same law is quite apparent that they export and import almost in equal amounts. We are exporting, both directly and indirectly, to Africa to pay for materials which we are taking from there, which are quite considerable. For example, to show that the exports and imports are quite apt to run the same, I direct attention to Togoland, a little portion of Africa up in West Africa which is approximately the size of Florida.

Their imports in 1913 were £531,000,000 sterling and their exports £456,000,000 sterling; in the case of the Kamerun, the imports in 1911 were 26,000,000 marks and the exports 21,000,000 marks, showing the fact that trade is always reciprocal. So when we buy from Africa we must sell to Africa. Of course, we are taking from Africa directly, and through England, diamonds, gold, and other materials, particularly ostrich feathers.

It is quite interesting to note that our trade with South Africa has fallen off quite markedly in the last two or three years. That is due to the fact that we have not been buying as many of the luxuries, particularly diamonds and ostrich feathers, which we formerly purchased from Africa, and, as we have failed to import from there, we have failed to export to there.

Of course, the extension of civilization, as I have said, is simply the selling of goods and the buying of goods; indeed, civilization is goods. It is quite interesting to note in passing something which I always insist upon, that we live in a law-ordered world in which that which is commercially sound is ethically right. It is ethically right to reach these people in Africa, and it is commercially wise to do so. Any policy which might be right ethically and not sound commercially is not one to be considered, for it leads us into impossible schemes.

It is ethically right for us to extend the boundaries of civilization to Africa, and it is commercially wise to do so. It would enrich America, the whole world, and would benefit that continent, which is in need so greatly of development.

Indeed, in the last analysis, it is to be remembered that even Christianity itself is dependent upon goods. You can not export a political idea; you can not even export Christianity, if I may use that expression, to Africa without exporting the goods which are indispensable to Christianity. To indicate what I mean I refer to the fact that Christianity depends upon Bibles, upon school books, upon proper habitations, upon the proper relationships between individuals, all of which must be based upon goods. In the last analysis, as has well been said, Christianity is service, and service must be expressed in goods; so that it is particularly sound ethically and it is very wise commercially to do what I have suggested.

The extent of the former German territories is, as will be seen from the map, approximately one-third of the total continental area of the United States. Great wealth is there and our young citizens could find attractive opportunities for service in this great field. I need not enlarge upon our peculiar interest in and obligation to the people of Africa. Thousands of Americans have for years been contributing to the missionary work which has been carried on by the noble men and women who have been sent out in that field by the churches of America. On a previous occasion I referred at length to this whole problem of missionary work and of its importance to the spread of civilization. America, the great pioneer in this work, should not seek to evade her responsibility for the accomplishment, by great international action, of those purposes which the missionaries have sought to realize through individual effort. The rapid spread of Islam, described by Lothrop Stoddard in his new work, "The New World of Islam," can not be checked unless there be cooperation on the part of the enlightened nations in the spread of the true faith.

I ask permission to incorporate as a part of my remarks at this point certain tables showing the export and import trade of the former German colonies in Africa, and also material with reference to their area and population.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPENCER in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

STATISTICS CONCERNING FORMER GERMAN COLONIES.

A. TOGOLAND.

1. Administration (Statesman's Yearbook, 1921, p. 253): Togoland was surrendered unconditionally by the Germans to British and French forces in August, 1914. The colony is now divided between the French and British.

2. Area (Deutsches Kolonial-Handbuch, Nach amtlichen Quellen bearbeitet. Berlin, 1913, p. 1. According to Statesman's Yearbook, the area is 33,700 square miles): 87,000 square kilometers.

3. Population (white) in 1912, 345 (Deutsches Kolonial-Handbuch, 1913, p. 1); population (colored) in 1913, 1,031,978 (Statesman's Yearbook, 1921, p. 253).

4. Imports and exports (ibid., p. 254):

	Pounds.
Imports, 1913	531,550
Exports, 1913	456,850
Imports, 1919	665,332
Exports, 1919	850,774

The principal imports were cotton goods, provisions, salt, and tobacco. The principal exports were palm oil, palm kernels, cocoa, copra, and cotton.

B. CAMEROON.

1. Administration (Statesman's Yearbook, 1921, p. 255): The colony was captured from the Germans by French and British troops in February, 1916, and is now divided between the British and the French.

2. Area (Deutsches Kolonial-Handbuch, 1913, p. 23. According to Statesman's Yearbook, 191,130 square miles): 745,000 square kilometers.

3. Population (white) in 1912 (ibid., p. 24), 1,537; population (colored) in 1912 (ibid., p. 24), 2,537,400.

4. Imports and exports (Auslandsbuch für Kaufleute, Leipzig, 1913, p. 15):

	Marks.
Imports, 1911	26,338,830
Exports, 1911	21,185,859

In 1919 imports into British Cameroon amounted to 67,000 pounds; exports, 235,000 pounds (Statesman's Yearbook, 1921, p. 255).

Chief imports: Textiles, spirits, timber, iron wares, rice, tobacco, salt. Chief exports: Rubber, palm kernels, cocoa, palm oil, ivory.

5. Communication (ibid.): A new direct cable to Germany was opened in 1913. Railways in 1913, 149 miles.

6. Economic wealth (ibid.): The colony is rich in hardwood; ebony is abundant. Gold and iron have been found. Natives in the Bamenda Division smelt iron. Salt is found in the Keara country, Ossidinge Division, and at Bamessing, in the Bamenda Division.

C. SOUTHWEST AFRICA.

1. Administration (Statesman's Yearbook, 1921, p. 239): The Union of South Africa administers the territory under a mandate from the League of Nations, dated December 17, 1920.

2. Area (Deutsches Kolonial-Handbuch, 1913, Deutsch-Südwestafrika, p. 1: The Statesman's Yearbook gives 322,400 square miles): 835,100 square kilometers.

3. Population (white) in 1912 (ibid.), 14,816; population (colored) in 1912 (The Statesman's Yearbook, 1921, p. 239; the estimate is exclusive of Ovamboland, in the north, where there are probably 100,000 Ovambos), 90,000 (estimated).

"Although 6,350 Germans were deported during 1919, the European population in 1919 is estimated at 16,000 to 17,000. The newcomers are mostly South Africans in search of farms." (ibid.)

4. Imports and exports:

	Marks.
Imports, 1911 (Auslandsbuch für Kaufleute, p. 17)	44,893,804
Exports, 1911	28,573,244
Imports, 1919 (The Statesman's Yearbook, 1921, p. 240), pounds sterling	1,135,116
Exports, 1919	1,679,534

Chief imports: Metals, textiles, agricultural implements, engines, beer and spirits, spices, meat, leather goods, wood. Chief exports: Diamonds, copper, lead, animal products.

5. Mineral production (Statesman's Yearbook, 1921, pp. 240-241): Five of the German diamond mining companies in the Lüderitzbuch area have been acquired by the Consolidated Diamond Mines of Southwest Africa (Ltd.), which is registered in South Africa. The stones, which are small but of good quality, are found in the sand along the coast, but in no case at a greater distance than 15 miles from the sea. During 1919 the yield was 462,181 carats, valued at £2,081,863. The total output since 1908, when the mines were first discovered, has been 6,669,246 carats, valued at £13,349,690. The copper mines at Tsumeb were handicapped at the beginning of the year by shipping difficulties. Their output in 1919 was 26,675 tons. Alluvial tin is being worked in the Karibib and Omaruru districts, and valuable deposits of colored marble at Karibib. Prospecting has been allowed since March 1, 1920. Coal is greatly required but only poor seams have so far been located.

6. Agriculture (ibid., p. 241): The Protectorate is essentially a stock-raising country. Roughly speaking, Windhuk and the country to the north is a cattle country and the southern portion is a sheep country. Stock thrive well in nearly every part, and retain their condition in times of drought in a wonderful way. No artificial feeding is required; 17,266 cattle and 87,000 sheep were exported in 1919. In 1914 there were 240,000 cattle and 1,125,000 small stock; the estimated number in 1920 was 400,000 cattle and 2,225,000 sheep and goats. No agriculture is possible without irrigation, except in the northwest, and there unseasonable or poor rains frequently result in very poor crops.

The German administration tried to encourage the tobacco industry, but with very little success; and although cotton and wheat do fairly well, the principal crop is maize.

Approximately 37,000,000 acres have been taken up out of a total of 207,000,000.

A land board has been established, and farms are being given out on 5-year leases, with the option of purchase on an installment principle. Personal occupation is an essential. As boring is necessary on nearly all vacant Government ground before it can be allotted, the board can only go slowly. Fifty-eight drills have been purchased by the administration for this purpose. The usual size of farms is 3,000 hectares in the north and 10,000 to 20,000 in the south. A hectare is roughly 2.47 acres. Large numbers of applications for farms have been received.

7. Communications (Statesman's Yearbook, 1921, p. 241): The wireless station (Telefunken system) at Windhuk, which in 1914 was one of the most powerful in the world, is not being used, nor is the German cable station at Swakopmund. Cables are sent to Cape Town for dispatch.

The total length of Government railway lines is 967 miles of 3 foot 6 inch gauge and 98 miles of 2-foot gauge, and of private lines 98 miles.

8. Finance (ibid., p. 240): For the financial year 1919-20 the revenue amounted to £654,370 and the expenditure to £718,100 (1918-19: Revenue, £377,049; expenditure, £744,407). The estimates for the year 1920-21 are: Revenue, £1,025,000; expenditure, £849,674. The principal source of revenue is the tax on diamonds, which is estimated to yield £800,000.

D. EAST AFRICA (NOW TANGANYIKA TERRITORY).

1. Administration (Statesman's Yearbook, 1921, p. 182): The country has been divided between the British and Belgians and is to be administered under mandates approved by the League of Nations.

2. Area (Deutsches Kolonial-Handbuch, 1913, Deutsch-Ostafrika, p. 1): Nine hundred and ninety-five thousand square kilometers.

3. Population (white) in 1912 (ibid.) 4,886

Population (colored) in 1913 (Statesman's Yearbook, p. 182) 7,659,898

4. Imports and exports:

	Marks.
Imports, 1911 (Deutsches Kolonial-Handbuch, 1913, p. 3)	45,301,955
Exports, 1911	22,437,760
Imports, 1919 (Statesman's Yearbook, p. 183), pounds	1,158,000
Exports, 1919	1,426,000

Chief imports: Cotton piece goods, rice, foodstuffs, kerosene, tobacco, spirits, wine, and beer. Chief exports: Sisal, cotton, hides, skins, copra, wax, nuts, grain, rubber, ivory.

5. Economic wealth (ibid.): Near the coast forests of mangrove, coco palm, baobab, tamarind, etc.; in the higher regions the acacia, cotton tree, sycamore, banian, and other trees. Government forests, 652,067 acres. There are a number of plantations of coco palms, coffee ton (on the higher lands), caoutchouc, sugar, cotton, cardamom, cinchona. Fiber plants, especially sisal, are successfully cultivated. In 1912 there were 43,617 cattle, 41,647 sheep and goats in the possession of Europeans, and 3,950,250 cattle and 6,398,300 sheep and goats in the possession of natives. Minerals known to exist within the protectorate are coal, iron, lead, copper, mica, and salt. Agates, topaz, moonstones, tourmaline, and quartz crystals are found, and garnets in large quantities.

E. NEW GUINEA.

1. Administration (Statesman's Yearbook, 1921, p. 419): New Guinea included Kaiser Wilhelm's Land, Bismarck Archipelago, Solomon Islands, Nauru, Caroline Islands, Marshall Islands, Ladrone Islands (excepting Guam). These possessions were occupied by an Australian force on September 12, 1914. The islands north of the Equator, namely, the Marshall, Caroline, Pelew, and Ladrone (Marianne) Islands, are to be administered by Japan as mandatory. Those south of the Equator, namely, the Bismarck Archipelago, those of the Solomon Islands, formerly owned by Germany, and (late) German New Guinea, are assigned to Australia. German Samoa is assigned to New Zealand. The mandate from the League of Nations is dated December 17, 1920.

2. Area (Deutsches Kolonial-Handbuch, 1913, Deutsch-Neuguinea, p. 1): Two hundred and forty-two thousand five hundred square kilometers.

3. Population (white) in 1912 (ibid.), 1,278. Population (colored) in 1912 (Auslandsbuch für Kaufleute, p. 22), 580,000.

4. Imports and exports:

	Marks.
Imports, 1911 (Auslandsbuch für Kaufleute, p. 22)	7,506,508
Exports, 1911	12,026,851

Chief imports: Groceries, wine, spirits, beer, hardware, machinery, tobacco, drapery, shoes, oils, and kerosene. Chief exports: Copra, shell, birds of paradise, cocoa, phosphate.

F. SAMOA.

1. Administration (Statesman's Yearbook, 1921, p. 438): On August 20, 1914, the British occupied German Samoa. The island is assigned under a mandate from the League of Nations to the King of England in right of his dominion of New Zealand. The mandate is dated December 17, 1920.

2. Area (Deutsches Kolonial-Handbuch, 1913, Samoa, p. 35): Two thousand five hundred and seventy-two square kilometers.

3. Population (white) in 1912 (ibid.), 499. Population (colored) in 1912 (ibid.), 36,637.

4. Imports and exports:

	Marks.
Imports, 1911 (Auslandsbuch für Kaufleute, 1913, p. 24)	4,066,238
Exports, 1911	4,389,983

	Pounds sterling.
Imports, 1919 (Statesman's Yearbook, 1921, p. 439)	291,368
Exports, 1919	532,500

The chief imports were: Groceries, textiles, timber, building material, metals, machinery. Chief exports: Copra, cocoa, rubber, cardamoms, sugar.

G. KLAUSCHOU.

1. Administration (Statesman's Yearbook, p. 1058): The territory was captured by the Japanese and British forces in November, 1914, and is now administered by Japan under a mandate.

2. Area (Deutsches Kolonial-Handbuch, 1913, Klauschou, p. 51. The Statesman's Yearbook, 200 square miles): Five hundred and fifty-one and seven-tenths square kilometers.

3. Population in 1913: One hundred and ninety-one thousand nine hundred and eighty-four (ibid., p. 51).

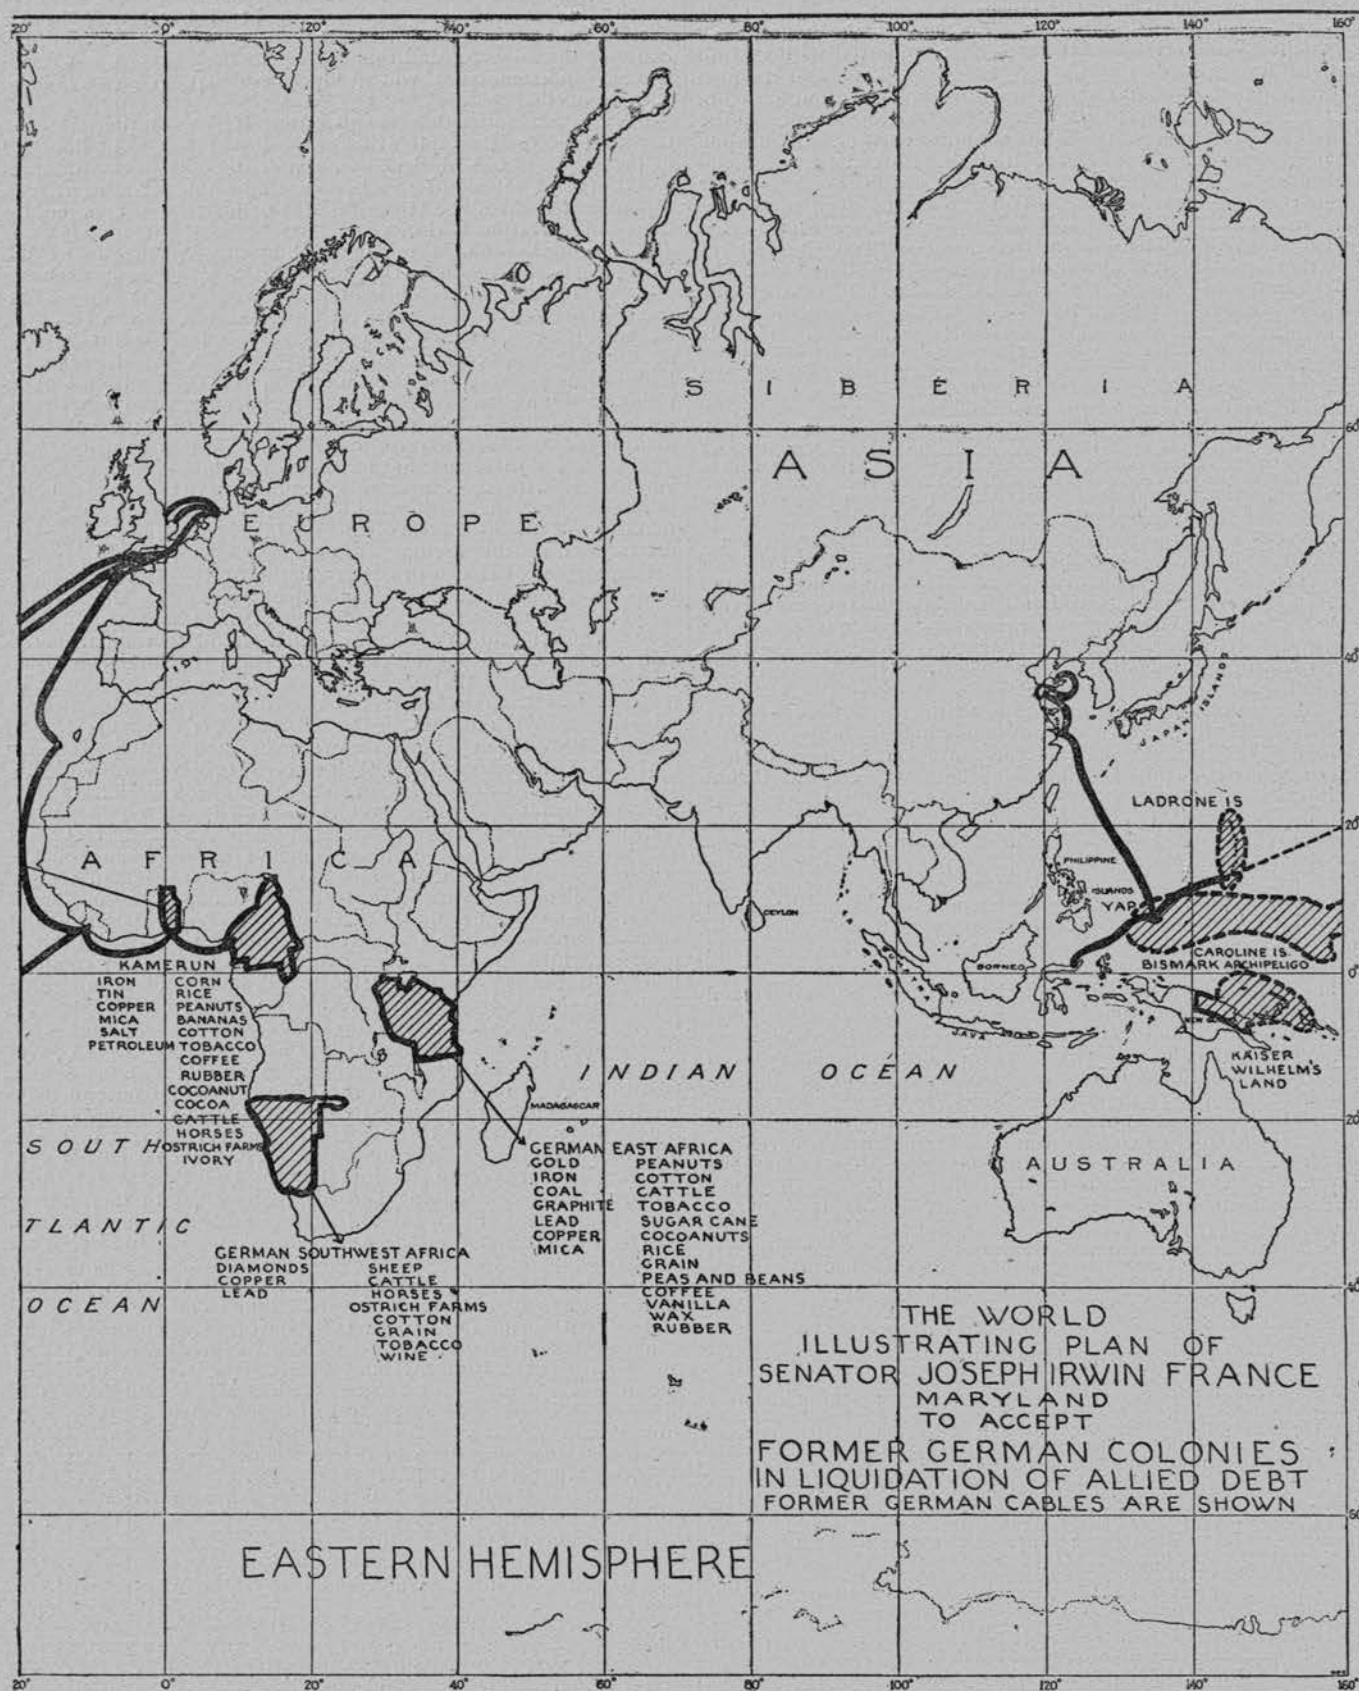

4. Imports and exports:

	Mexican dollars.
Imports, 1911-12 (Deutsches Kolonial-Handbuch, 1913, Klauschou, p. 51. The Mexican dollar=50 cents)	52,900,000
Exports, 1911-12	37,000,000
Imports, 1919 (Statesman's Yearbook, 1921, p. 1059)	61,557,059
Exports, 1919	69,131,550

The chief imports were cotton goods, cigarettes, metals, petroleum, lumber, dies. The chief exports were ground nut and bean oil, wheat, tobacco, Shantung pongees, silk, hides, cotton.

Mr. FRANCE. - Mr. President, we needed not a disarmament conference, but an economic conference, for unless the economic causes for war are removed disarmament must prove to be futile. No passive peace to preserve any world status can be permanent. Permanent peace between the great powers must be the product of concert of purpose and cooperation in effort between them in the extension of the boundaries of civilization and for the material as well as the moral and spiritual advancement of the world. The plan I propose is not imperialism for America, because our fundamental doctrines make imperialism impossible; our doctrine that all men are endowed with certain inalienable rights—to life, liberty, self-government, and the pursuit of happiness—would impose upon us the obligation to secure these rights ultimately to all those in the territory coming to the United States. Imperialism leads to oppression and exploitation.

No American need ever fear that his Government can embark upon a policy of imperialism. I wish that every Senator might read the great works of a truly great American and Christian statesman, the late Alpheus Henry Snow, who in his books, The Administration of Dependencies, The Question of the Aborigines in the Law and Practice of Nations, and The American Philosophy of Government, has greatly treated this subject. In The American Philosophy of Government he says:

The belief in the fundamental rights of the individual which we hold destroys all motive for conquest, since the only effect of conquest by us is to place upon us the difficult task of securing the fundamental rights of the individual in the countries annexed.

And in The Question of the Aborigines he says:

As the Constitution contains a Bill of Rights, imposing certain prohibitions or conditions upon the action of all the organs of the Central Government respecting individuals under the sovereignty of the United States, all of the provisions of this Bill of Rights, which are of universal application, are applicable in all the colonies and dependencies of the United States from the moment of their acquisition.

Americanism enjoins and compels elevation, development, liberation. That is well illustrated by the statement of a British officer made some time ago. He said wherever the Americans have gone into colonial development they have succeeded greatly. Wherever the French go you find railroads; wherever the Germans go you find arsenals; wherever the British go you find customhouses; and wherever the Americans go you find schoolhouses.

Shall we seek to escape all of the white man's burden? We owe a peculiar duty to Africa, and one which we have too long ignored. When Stanley carried the Stars and Stripes through the wilderness of the Kongo Basin the sovereignty over that territory became vested, by a right which we did not assert, in the United States. The cruelties and the atrocities there later practiced and the bloodshed and agony of those there who should have been our wards can all be charged to the timidity which caused the failure on the part of our Government to assert our sovereignty. The world which is passing has been destroyed by the hatreds, passions, and ambitions of imperialism. The new world which is to be builded must have its foundation laid deep in the cement of cooperation and affection.

This policy of participation in the elevation, education, and evangelization of these backward people is morally right, as I have said, and commercially wise. I have on a previous occasion quoted from the eloquent words of Lord Macaulay, spoken on July 10, 1833, in a memorable debate on a bill for the exclusion of Hindus from office in India, to which he was opposed. In the paragraph which I am about to quote he enunciates the doctrine which has been held by the great progressive men of England, but denied by too many of those who have been in power in the British Government—the doctrine that what is ethically right is also commercially sound. He said:

We are told that the time can never come when the natives of India can be admitted to high civil and military office. We are told that this is the condition on which we hold our power. We are told that we are bound to confer on our subjects—every benefit which they are capable of enjoying? No.

He was answering his opponent.

Which it is in our power to confer on them? But which we can confer on them without hazard to our own domination. Against that proposition I solemnly protest as inconsistent alike with sound policy and sound morality. * * * It is the most childish ambition to covet dominion which adds to no man's comfort or security. To the great trading nation, to the great manufacturing nation, no progress which any portion of the human race can make in knowledge, in taste for the conveniences of life, or in the wealth by which those conveniences are produced can be a matter of indifference. * * * To trade with civilized men is infinitely more profitable than to govern savages. * * * To have found a great people sunk in the lowest depths of slavery and superstition, to have so ruled them as to have made them desirous and capable of all the privileges of citizens would, indeed, be a title to glory all our own. The scepter may pass away from us. Unforeseen accidents may derange our most profound schemes of policy. Victory may be inconstant to our arms, but there are triumphs which are followed by no reverses. There is an empire exempt from all national causes of decay. These triumphs are the pacific triumphs of reason over barbarism; that empire is the imperishable empire of our arts and our morals, our literature and our law.

CONCLUSION.

Mr. President, it is difficult to treat so vast a subject within a reasonable limitation of time, but I trust that I have been able to indicate that we are facing grave economic problems, that we must secure international cooperation for the solution of these problems, and that until these problems are solved we may not, considering the interests of all of the people, yield to those impulses, prompted by our affection and deep sense of gratitude for the noble men who so heroically served in our armies, and grant to them the bonus which many of them, because of the adverse conditions in which they have found themselves, conditions over which they have had no control, have been compelled to ask.

I hope that you will remember that if the solution which I have offered for the liquidation of the allied debt to us does not at first seem to be a desirable one, it is the only one so far proposed, except cancellation, which is impossible. At least, it is a plan which should be studied and, I believe, acted upon before the bonus question is decided.

The liquidation of these huge obligations owing us by the European countries, and the inauguration of a comprehensive plan of international cooperation between the advanced nations—more particularly the United States, Great Britain, France, Italy, Germany, Poland, and Russia—for the solving of the common economic problems of the world, for the rehabilitation of the world's machinery, for the more intensive production and more extensive circulation of goods in commerce, in short for concert of action by the nations in a common purpose of world restoration, with no binding treaties and alliances, but with each nation free, unbound, sovereign, acting voluntarily with the others to accomplish that which would be ethically right and economically wise—these would result in immediate benefits to every worker, farmer, business man, and producer in all the world.

I am confident that a drastic reduction in the German reparations, the liquidation of Europe's debt to us, and the opening up of the Russian markets would result in industrial and commercial activity in this country which would be comparable to that during the period of the war. The peril of our position is due to the fact that the world can not remain where it is. The distress from which it suffers will be progressive if it is not cured. We must immediately take steps looking to the world's recovery, or we must move on toward greater economic and social disorganization. With the return of prosperity in this country, which is being prevented only by reactionary policies, the bonus and other problems could be solved in such a way as to advance the interests of all America. The return of prosperity—and it can be almost immediately summoned back—will relieve our millions of unemployed, many of whom are ex-soldiers. The plan which I have proposed should be considered before the bonus question is taken up. It is quite possible that such a plan, looking to business restoration, would put us in a position which would enable us to meet some form of soldiers' bonus without a serious addition to the burden of taxation.

Mr. President, on yesterday I suggested that I might show in the Senate some very interesting moving pictures bearing upon this subject. Some time ago the Universal Film Co.—one of the great organizations of the country—and the Smithsonian Institution sent an expedition to Africa for the purpose of making a study with the films of that great continent, in order that the people of the United States and of the world might be better informed upon the geographic and ethnologic conditions in Africa. I have been permitted by the Universal Film Co.—some of its officers having had my plan called to their attention—to use this film in presenting this subject to the Congress and to certain groups of the American people. It did not seem to be feasible, owing to the objection on the part of some of the members of the Rules Committee, for me to illustrate my remarks here with moving pictures, so I have been forced to be content with using these charts. However, when the Senate adjourns I shall display some of these pictures in room 112 of the Senate Office Building, and I should be glad to have any Senators or Members of Congress who care to see these pictures—the few that I can show in the limited time which Senators would care to give to viewing them—come to that room in order that they may have a revelation as to what the country is concerning which I have been talking. Although I have studied the subject somewhat from the maps and from the reports I was astonished myself when I really took a journey into Africa by means of these films. I shall be glad to have any Senator, after the adjournment of the Senate, come to room 112, Senate Office Building, where some of these pictures will be displayed.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator be able to do that at once? Is he going from here over there now?

Mr. FRANCE. When the Senate adjourns.

Mr. NORRIS. If we should adjourn now, the Senator would be ready to go ahead?

Mr. FRANCE. Yes; we shall be ready when the Senate adjourns, and I think the pictures will prove to be quite interesting.

Mr. KELLOGG, Mr. SIMMONS, and Mr. McNARY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. FRANCE. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota. I think he rose first.

Mr. KELLOGG. I hope no Senator will make a motion to adjourn until the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] comes up. He is in charge of the treaty and is desirous of going on with it as long as possible and I have sent for him.

Mr. NORRIS. I suppose, then, that we may divide ourselves up. Those who want to go with the Senator from Maryland can go, and the Senator from Minnesota and the Senator from Massachusetts can stay here and consider the treaty and save the country.

APPENDIX.

[From the Financial Review, Jan. 14, 1922.]

ARE WE FAILING TO UPHOLD THE GOLD STANDARD?—SENATOR ODDIE INSISTS THAT EVEN IF WE HAVE THE LARGEST RESERVES OUR DUTY IS TO CONTRIBUTE IN LARGER MEASURE TO NEW OUTPUT.

(An exclusive statement on the gold situation written for the Financial Review by Senator TASKER L. ODDIE.)

The gold production of the world has declined from $469,000,000 in 1915 to $325,000,000 in 1920, a decrease of $134,000,000, or 28.5 per cent, while that of the United States has declined from $101,000,000 to $51,000,000, a decrease of $50,000,000, or 49 per cent. Of the total decline of the world's production during this period, that of the United States is accountable for 37 per cent, although its normal contribution to the gold production of the world has been about 21 per cent.

In 1915 the United States produced 21.5 per cent of the world's output of gold, and in 1920 it produced 15.2 per cent, while the gold production of the British Empire in the former year amounted to 63 per cent of the total production of the world, and in the latter it had risen to over 70 per cent.

The decline in the gold production of the world, excluding that of this country, from 1915 to 1920, was 22.8 per cent, while that of the United States was 49 per cent, or more than double.

¹ United States Mint Report.

This extensive decline in gold production throughout the world has been largely due to the increased cost of labor and material since 1915, as against a fixed price for gold, $20.67 per fine ounce. The gold producer in the United States has been in the same position as a person who had received no increase in income to meet the increasing living costs during the war and postwar periods, and occupies the same position to-day. In all countries outside of the United States, however, there has been a factor which in a large measure has compensated for these increased costs since 1919. The standard price of gold in London has been 85 shillings per fine ounce, but on account of the depreciation in sterling exchange in terms of the gold standard, newly produced gold has sold at auction in the London market at an average during 1920 of approximately 113 shillings per fine ounce, or a premium of about 33 per cent. Because of the serious condition which confronted the producers of gold in British territory, the Government in July, 1919, permitted the export of newly produced gold from its possessions under a license, and since that time the gold producers of the Empire have been receiving an exchange premium. The benefit of this premium is well illustrated in the accompanying table of annual declines, where it is shown that the decline of the world's production for 1919 was about half that of 1918.

In the United States, however, nothing has been done to assist the gold producer or to in any way compensate for the increased cost of production, which is borne out by the fact that the extent of the decline of gold production in the United States has been about double that of the remainder of the world. When one considers the position of the United States as the creditor nation of the world, it is not a condition which can be pointed to with any degree of American pride. Since the maintenance of the gold standard depends upon the ability of the world to produce gold, in which the United States should contribute its normal share, it seems all the more deplorable that this Government should have been so negligent in this regard.

Annual declines in gold production.

1915-16.....	$24,548,418	5.2	$8,445,400	8.3	$16,103,018	4.4	34.4
1916-17.....	24,754,400	5.5	8,839,600	9.5	15,914,800	4.5	35.7
1917-18.....	35,816,548	8.5	15,104,000	18.0	20,712,548	6.2	42.2
1918-19.....	17,816,756	4.6	8,313,300	12.1	9,503,456	3.0	46.6
1919-20.....	30,801,186	8.4	9,146,500	15.1	21,654,686	7.1	29.7
1915-1920.....	133,737,308	28.5	49,548,800	49.3	83,888,508	22.8	37.3

It is obvious that a mere change of position of the gold that has been formerly employed in national monetary reserves is contributing nothing to expand the base upon which the entire credit and currency structure of the world now rests. The financial authorities of this Nation are little concerned over this serious situation, as they would regard the gold which we have acquired during and since the war by importation as a fixed addition to the prewar gold reserve of this country. Little consideration has been given to the fact that this loss of gold to the reserves of foreign nations has played so important a part in the depreciation of their currencies and, consequently, their purchasing power in our market. No return to the normal purchasing power of the remainder of the world can be possible until the restoration of their currencies on the gold basis. To accomplish this return to normal this gold must inevitably be redistributed to the gold reserves of the nations which have become depleted through its shipment here. Our export trade has already declined seriously because of this condition, and will continue to decline unless the matter is dealt with in a broad and comprehensive way to restore the economic poise of Europe.

The best information now available would indicate that the gold production of this year (1921) will not exceed $320,000,000, while that of the United States will certainly be less than $50,000,000. More than half of the gold-producing properties of the United States that were operating in 1915 have since been closed down, and many of these properties are now filled with water, their ore reserves caving, and their expensive surface plants disintegrating. That the condition in the gold-mining industry has not greatly improved with the decline in wholesale prices and wages is evidenced by the report of the President's conference on unemployment through its committee on emergency measures and mining, made public October 13, 1921, as follows:

"Gold mining suffers from the excessive cost of supplies and other items, and the value of the gold output being fixed as against material advances in cost has operated to restrict the employment of labor in gold mines."

The gold-purchasing power of the Nation has been seriously crippled, and, if the Government continues to follow this policy, will suffer still more serious losses in the future. As a matter of necessity, as well as a matter of national pride, the Government should remedy this situation if it is desirable to maintain the gold-producing power of the Nation on a level with the remainder of the world and thereby to sustain the gold standard as the basis of all credit and currency transactions. If the Government shirks its responsibility in this regard, it must necessarily subject this Nation to the difficulties which may ensue in the straightening out of the world's economic affairs, in which the maintenance of the world's gold standard may be seriously impaired.

Before remedial legislation can be expected, the people of our country must be educated to understand and see that the reestablishment of a sound and ample monetary basis is necessary as the only safe foundation for our business and financial structure.

TASKER L. ODDIE.

DECEMBER 31, 1921.

During the delivery of Mr. FRANCE'S speech,

WORLD WAR FOREIGN DEBT COMMISSION.

Mr. McCUMBER, from the Committee on Finance, to which were referred the following nominations, reported them with the recommendation that the nominations be confirmed:

The following-named persons to be members, with the Secretary of the Treasury, of the World War Foreign Debt Commission:

Charles E. Hughes, the Secretary of State.

Herbert C. Hoover, the Secretary of Commerce.

Reed Smoot, of the Senate.

Theodore E. Burton, of the House of Representatives.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask that the nominations may go to the calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The nominations will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

After the conclusion of Mr. FRANCE'S speech,

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPENCER in the chair). The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Glass	McKinley	Robinson
Borah	Harris	McNary	Sheppard
Brandegee	Harrison	Moses	Simmons
Cameron	Heflin	New	Smith
Capper	Johnson	Newberry	Spencer
Caraway	Jones, N. Mex.	Nicholson	Sterling
Colt	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Townsend
Edge	Kellogg	Oddie	Trammell
Elkins	Kendrick	Overman	Underwood
Fernald	King	Page	Wadsworth
Fletcher	Ladd	Phipps	Walsh, Mont.
France	Lodge	Pittman	Warren
Gerry	McKellar	Pomerene	Williams

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-two Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I read in the Washington Post of to-day a statement that President Harding on yesterday sent to the Senate the names of Secretary Mellon, Secretary Hughes, Secretary Hoover, Senator Smoot, and Representative Burton to be members of the Foreign Debt Funding Commission.

I make no criticism of a personal character upon these selections made by the President. They are all able and upright gentlemen. All of them have had large business and financial experience. They are all admittedly entirely competent. I do not mean now to express any opposition to their confirmation. I assume they will be confirmed by the Senate without opposition.

Nevertheless, Mr. President, I want to express my keen disappointment, and I believe that disappointment will be shared by the people of this country, irrespective of party, that the President of the United States in the selection of a commission to settle the vast indebtedness covered by our loans to foreign Governments, an indebtedness growing out of loans made from money contributed by all the people of the country, irrespective of party, saw fit to select the entire commission from the party which he represents.

It is well known, Mr. President, that in the discussions which took place in this Chamber with reference to the settlement of these debts there were sharp conflicts of opinion. Especially was there a sharp conflict with reference to the extension of the payment of the interest upon these debts, and when we came to a vote upon that question this Chamber was divided, not altogether but very nearly altogether, upon party lines.

I do not wish to extend my remarks with reference to this matter, but I do want to say in conclusion that, in view of this division as well as in view of the general interest of all the people in these loans—because they furnished the money which created the debt, and when the debt is paid the money will be theirs, and if the debt is not paid the loss will be theirs—without any desire to criticize the President, I can not refrain from expressing the wish that he had seen the fitness and the propriety of allowing the opposition party in Congress at least one representative upon this commission.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I share the high esteem expressed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] of the ability of the distinguished gentlemen named upon this commission, and particularly those two members representing the legislative branch of the Government.

When the bill respecting this subject was under consideration, I expressed the view that no Member of Congress was eligible to appointment upon that commission. I have investigated the subject to some extent, and my investigation has confirmed me in the opinion I then expressed. I do not believe that under the Constitution either the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] or Representative BURTON is eligible to appointment upon the commission, and whenever the subject is before the Senate on the confirmation of the nominations, I shall desire to say something, unless I do so at some time earlier.

The subject was very exhaustively considered at one time by a committee of the House of Representatives, of which Speaker Henderson was the chairman, and, as I think, the correct rule was laid down, namely, that there is no constitutional objection whatever to the appointment of Members of Congress upon commissions vested with no authority except to investigate and report to Congress. Neither is there any objection to the appointment of Members of Congress upon commissions to negotiate treaties which are afterwards to be submitted to the Senate for ratification; but whenever commissions are vested with power to deal finally with a matter with respect to which they are authorized to act, they then become officers of the United States and fall under the inhibition of the constitutional provision and their nominations must be confirmed by the Senate.

I shall be glad to refer to the report at length.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Has the Senator, in his investigation of this question, come across a speech by the late Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts, upon this subject?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; I have not.

Mr. BORAH. It has been some time since I read it, but he did discuss it at one time.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. My recollection is that that was in connection with the appointment of commissioners to negotiate the treaty at the close of the Spanish War.

Mr. BORAH. I do not remember the occasion of it, but he took the position that they should not be appointed as a matter of policy, and could not be appointed, as I recall, under the Constitution.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The matter was the subject of consideration in the Senate at one time, I think not in that connection; but on one occasion when Senator McComas, of Maryland, submitted quite an elaborate report reciting occasions when Members of the Senate or Members of the House, or both, were appointed upon commissions to negotiate treaties, he referred to a long list of precedents, reaching away back to the early days of the Republic when Members of Congress were appointed as commissioners to negotiate treaties.

That could be justified upon two grounds not applicable here. In the first place, the power to negotiate treaties is reposed in the President, and he can employ any agencies he sees fit, without any regard to the action of the Congress, to negotiate a treaty. So he could choose a Representative in Congress if he desired to do so, or he could choose outside persons. These commissioners are not officers who are personal representatives or agents of the President.

It could also be justified upon the ground that they merely conduct the negotiations in their preliminary stages and the result of their work is submitted for ratification by the Senate, and it is ineffective without such ratification; but it will be remembered that in this case the commission's action is to be absolutely final, without any submission whatever. Under those circumstances, by all the authorities to which my attention has been directed in the rather unsatisfactory examination I have given them, they must be denominated as officers falling within the constitutional prohibition.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, as the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] was proceeding with his very timely and able speech, I thought of the time when President Wilson issued a letter to the voters of the country suggesting that he would like to have a Democratic Congress, and how Republican leaders misconstrued that letter, and said that the President was seeking to obtain a Congress composed only of Democrats. They made the point that Republicans and Democrats had won the war, that people who voted the Republican ticket and those who voted the Democratic ticket had supported the war program in every way they could; that there should not be any politics in it, and that there ought to be Democrats and Republicans in Congress.

President Wilson really was asking for a Democratic Congress, but he did not mean that there should not be any Republicans in the House and in the Senate. He was asking for a working majority, and that was all. A similar appeal had been made once before, by Mr. Lincoln, and by Mr. McKinley, and also by Mr. Roosevelt; but at the time I speak of a great deal was said about Wilson wanting to shut out the Republicans and have only Democrats in Congress. They claimed his message was to this effect. Your leaders told the people in effect that President Wilson had said, "You Republicans are not good enough to come in and participate in shaping the policies of your Government. You are good enough to help win the war; you are good enough to send your sons to the battle fields, but now you are not good enough to go to Congress." When in fact President Wilson meant nothing of the kind.

Mr. President, as the Senator from North Carolina stated, this large amount of money, due to the people of the United States, amounting, interest and all, to about $11,000,000,000, is money which was furnished by Democrats and Republicans, and people who belonged to neither party, loaned to the Allies to help win the war, and now the same party which used the argument against the Democrats in 1918 that we wanted only Democrats on guard, is appointing five Republicans to handle that $11,000,000,000, due the whole people of the United States, Democrats and Republicans, and they are not going to let even one Democrat be placed on guard to keep the four Republican members straight. [Laughter.]

Oh, Mr. President, there is something wrong with this thing. If President Wilson had made a proposition like this, the able senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] would have given him a severe tongue lashing, and how solemn he would have looked, as my good friend the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] suggests to me. But here we are with an $11,000,000,000 indebtedness to be handled by five Republicans without a single Democrat to watch them. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARAWAY. And that without bond.

Mr. HEFLIN. And without bond. Oh, Mr. President, Republican criticism of that course would ring around this country like a trumpet call if a Democratic President had dared to name a commission of so much importance, a commission with so much power, without placing upon it at least one representative of the Republican Party. My good friend from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] asks me, "What about the Lord's Prayer—'Lead us not into temptation.'"

Five Republicans. No Democrats. You Democrats were good enough to put up the coin of the realm. You were good enough to contribute that which represents your toll and your investments. You were good enough to pay taxes and contribute your money to the Government; you were good enough to be sent out by the people of the whole country to win the great World War, or to help win it; but you are not good enough to sit in the council chamber when they come to deal with this big money matter and postpone even the interest for years to come. It is a pretty serious proposition, Senators. Eleven billion dollars is a heap of money to rest upon the unwatched constitutions of five Republicans. [Laughter.]

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McNARY in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HEFLIN. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I merely wish to remind the Senator that the Federal Reserve Board at the time President Wilson went out of office was composed exclusively of Democrats, and yet I have reason to believe that the Senator from Alabama was never satisfied with it.

Mr. HEFLIN. There have been all along Republicans on the Federal Reserve Board, and the head of the board is accused of having supported the Republican ticket in 1920. I am in favor of having some Republicans and some Democrats on that board. I have been in Congress several years, and I think it is a pretty good idea to have some Democrats and some Republicans on these boards or commissions.

I will tell you what I want to see, speaking for a good many of the Democrats in this country. I want at least one Democrat on that commission because the people are entitled to know what is going on on the inside. Without meaning to reflect at all upon the integrity of men suggested, politics is politics, and when five Republicans are sitting in secret council about what they will do with this great matter affecting $11,000,000,000 and the interest on it, it will play some part in politics, and the people of the country ought to be able to know exactly what is going on.

I do not suppose the President really means to put five Republicans on the commission, because it is due to the Democrats, who are going to be in control of the House after the next election, to give us at least one Democrat on the commission. I believe in fair play in all these things.

Before I sit down I repeat that if Woodrow Wilson had sent a proposition like this to the Senate, the Senators on the other side of the aisle would have been bobbing up and down like the little bird in one of these cuckoo clocks at the striking time of the hour of 12. [Laughter.]

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I believe the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] said the bill was not passed by a party vote.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; the Senator misunderstood me. I said when we came to vote upon that question it was almost upon the lines of party cleavage, but not altogether.

Mr. KELLOGG. It was absolutely on party lines so far as the Democrats were concerned. If the President is going to appoint a commission to settle a debt, he will naturally appoint men who are in sympathy with the settlement of the debt, and there was not a Democrat in the Senate who voted for that bill on its final passage—not one.

Mr. WILLIAMS. May I inquire of the Senator what bill he refers to?

Mr. KELLOGG. The bill to create a commission to settle the foreign debts.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And the Senator says that there was not a Democrat who voted for it?

Mr. KELLOGG. Not on its final passage.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, on the final passage. It may have happened that I was out of the Senate Chamber at the time, but I remember saying a few words in behalf of it, and being in favor of it in committee and elsewhere.

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator did not vote for it on the final passage in the Senate, nor did any other Democrat. I do not know whether there were any Democrats in the House who voted for it or not.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, in what I said I was not speaking about the vote upon the final passage of the measure. I think the vote upon the final passage of the measure was determined by the vote upon the proposition with reference to the extension of the interest. That was the controversy, and the only real controversy in the Senate. If that had been settled differently, the final vote would have been different. What I said was that the vital question of whether the interest should be extended indefinitely, arbitrarily at the will of the commission, was a question upon which, when we came to vote on that question, we voted almost entirely, but not altogether, upon party lines.

I suggested that that was one reason why those on this side of the Chamber or those who were opposed to the extension of the interest ought to have representation upon the commission, that together with the other fact which I cited and which the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] emphasized, namely, that this money was not contributed by any political party, but by the whole people of the United States. If it is collected, principal and interest, the receipts will not belong to any political party, but will inure to the benefit of the whole people of the United States. If the interest, now amounting to a billion dollars, is deferred indefinitely and probably none of it paid until it has reached a billion and a half or two billion dollars, all the people of the United States will have to suffer as a result.

Senators pointed out during the debate that there was one scheme known to be in contemplation that would inevitably eventuate in the entire loss of the interest. If by any chance of juggling or otherwise the interest should be entirely lost, the loss would not be confined to the Republican Party and its adherents, but it would be the loss of the whole people of the United States.

For these reasons I suggested that I wished the President might have found it expedient and fit to have accorded at least a minimum of representation to the opposition party.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat may I suggest that these credits were given and loans made by Democratic Secretaries of the Treasury without any Republican assistance at all. I have no complaint to make of that. It was perfectly proper. But the taxes were paid by Republicans and Democrats alike, and they were lending the money of Republicans and Democrats alike.

Mr. SIMMONS. But, if the Senator will pardon me, that was a mere perfunctory act upon the part of an official. Congress had voted the money. Congress had directed the loaning of the money.

Mr. LODGE. Very well; and now Congress has directed the collection of it. We are collecting money every day under acts of Congress from Republicans and Democrats and everybody else alike. A Democratic Secretary of the Treasury collected and received that money and now a Republican happens to be doing it.

Mr. SIMMONS. There is where the Senator from Massachusetts makes his fundamental mistake. This commission has no authority to collect a dollar and will not collect a dollar. This commission is appointed to settle and adjust an indebtedness existing between the foreign nations and the United States, and when that adjustment is made the collection will be made by the Secretary of the Treasury, who is a Republican.

Mr. LODGE. The collection is not the point.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is just the point the Senator made.

Mr. LODGE. That is a point I made because necessarily, under our form of government, one man representing one party deals with the finances habitually. There is no reason why five men of one party should not deal with a purely financial question. Mr. McAdoo and our colleague, Mr. GLASS, dealt with the making of the loans, the money for which came from all the people alike, and the making of the loans is quite as important as the collection thereof, and more easily done. Nobody found any fault with that. It was perfectly proper.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I was a little astonished a moment ago to hear that no Democrat had been in favor of arming the Executive with the right to adjust these foreign debts.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. I did not say no Democrat was in favor of it. I know the Senator from Mississippi was in favor of it, and I know it was stated that if he were to vote he would vote in favor of it, but he did not vote. I said there was no Democrat who voted for it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I announced my pair and accompanied the announcement with that expression. At any rate, there is no doubt of the fundamental fact that I was opposed to the amendments which were defeated and which wanted to bind us up in time and in interest in making the adjustments; that I was in favor of giving the Executive as full discretion as possible in agreeing to some sort of adjustment; and that I thought we would merely weaken our power if we limited the Executive too much. Knowing that later on the whole matter would have to be laid not only before the Senate but before the House as well, I wanted to give as much elasticity as possible in negotiating for a final settlement of mutual indebtedness.

But, Mr. President, if I had known that a commission was going to be appointed, not to represent the entire country, but to represent the Republican Party, a particular school of politics in the country, which had neither fought the war nor raised the money exclusively, or perhaps even mainly as far as the first proposition goes, I would never have been quite as liberal in the entertainment of my views or in the expression of them. I would have been very much more apt to have sympathized with those who wanted to circumscribe the functions and limit the actions of the commission.

The late President of the United States was very much criticised because most of the men who were appointed to negotiate the Versailles treaty were Democrats and because he himself went over and, in a measure, took charge of the negotiations. Whatever else may be said about that, it was a brave act; it was making action and responsibility synonymous. He took his burden in the open, not merely saying "My administration is responsible for the recommendations to Congress," but "I personally am responsible as one of the negotiators." There was nothing cowardly about it; there was nothing secret about it. It was a brave thing to have done, whether a wise one or not.

Mr. President, in the views that I entertained and in the views that I expressed, I confess that I did not have the slightest doubt that the commission upon whose action mainly Congress will ultimately rely was to be exclusively a partisan body. I have not yet learned to trust the Republican Party well enough to give it unlimited power. I have learned to trust the American people, and an American administration belonging to either party enough to give it at times unlimited power; but when I do so, I expect that power to be exercised in behalf of the whole people and by representatives of both political schools.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understood the Senator from Mississippi to state that Congress would have to rely upon the action of the commission. Does the Senator advert to the fact that, under the act of Congress, the findings, conclusions, and settlements made by the commission will be final and conclusive and that Congress will not have any power at all to review them?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I do not mean that. Whatever the intent of the act may be, the Congress of the United States can not be deprived of power to sit in judgment upon the final findings of the commission. It has that right, and an act of Congress can not take it away. It is a constitutional right. I know it was open to debate when the question was being passed upon as to whether the intent of the act was to make a final adjudication with the operation of law, but I knew that that could not be done, and, as a matter of fact, will not be done.

Any man in either House may rise at any time after a final report and question the final action; may bring it to the attention of the legislative body of this country; and if the law-making power shall conclude that a mistake has been made by the commission, there is no power in the heavens or the earth or the waters under the earth to keep the American Congress from acting; but, Mr. President, that is a mere side issue and that was debated very fully, although I did not participate in the debate, not thinking the point taken well worth combating. I do say, however, that this country is full of men who belong to my school of politics who thought that it was ill-advised to attempt to restrict and to limit too much the power of the negotiators in reaching an adjustment, but the opinions of those men would have been different from what they were had they known that the entire adjustment was to be accredited entirely to those who to-day represent but a little over one-half of the people of the United States, if the number is at all over one-half, notwithstanding the peculiarly fallacious illustration afforded by the last election.

Mr. President, the men comprising this commission, I doubt not, will act honestly as business men. I can see but one excuse for the partisan character of their appointment, and that grows out of the old Hamiltonian notion that financial affairs ought to be managed by the "better element." What was meant by the "better element" was the richer element. Conjoined with that premise—a major one—is the minor premise that the Federalists, and the Republican Party as their successors, were the financial classes, taking the country by and large, and that, therefore, they ought to be granted full power to conduct financial transactions. I myself never espoused that doctrine. I have thought that the man who paid $10 taxes to his State or to his county or to the Federal Government had as much right to a look-in, at any rate, if not to a say-so, as the man who paid $1,000. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], however, is right. In this case we are not even going to be allowed a look-in.

When the Versailles treaty was held up, President Wilson thought he did not have a right to appoint anybody to participate in the various meetings that were being held, but he appointed men who were to observe and to report. In this case you are not even allowing a Democrat go along as an observer or as a reporter. If there shall be any reporters, they will be from the outside, not from the inside of the commission.

Mr. BORAH. Did the Senator's party not have a representative in the Conference on the Limitation of Armament?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. How much do you want?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want a little bit more. A man may have buttermilk on Friday and yet have a little appetite for beefsteak on a succeeding Sunday. [Laughter.] There is no particular reason why he should be denied beefsteak merely because he has had buttermilk. However, Mr. President, I believe all of this will finally turn out some of these days, perhaps, for the better.

It may develop that one of the Cabinet officers, who was first of Democratic reputation and then later on of no political reputation, and then still later of Republican reputation, may change faith once more and give us a Democratic representative upon the commission. Without mentioning any names, that might happen; there is no telling; but if it does not happen, then we shall have no chance at all. If there be no sheep in wolves' clothing present, then there will be no sheep present at all. However, we have been rather accustomed for about half a century, with a few interludes, to paying the taxes and having the Republicans get the credit of everything that is done and at the same time pretend to constitute the Government, and it may be we can stand it for a little while longer without any of us committing suicide. We will manage to get along in some way. I always thought that even Republicans could not run this Government so badly that I would want to emigrate, although at about the time of the action on the Versailles treaty I was for once in my life tempted by the idea of emigrating.

But, seriously speaking, Mr. President, I hope the President of the United States will think over this matter to-night and to-morrow night and will send in the names of two supplementary commissioners, and that they may be Democrats, not mugwumps, not men of my peculiar thought upon this question, but representing what the majority of this side think, so that the commission may be truly and veritably bipartisan.

Mr. LODGE obtained the floor.

Mr. HEFLIN. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me a moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. LODGE. I should like first to state my purpose in rising. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], as I understand, does not desire this evening to speak on the so-called Yap treaty. Am I correct?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes; I should prefer to address the Senate to-morrow.

Mr. LODGE. Under those circumstances, Mr. President, as it is now half past 4 o'clock, I shall move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business with closed doors.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President—

Mr. LODGE. Before making the motion, I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, a little while ago the Senator from Massachusetts and I had a little colloquy about the personnel of the Federal Reserve Board. I am informed by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], who himself was Secretary of the Treasury, that there never has been a time when there was not a Republican on the Federal Reserve Board. Mr. Warburg was a Republican, Mr. Strauss was a Republican, and Mr. Platt, who is now on the board, is a Republican.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, before we leave the subject which we have just been discussing—

Mr. LODGE. I have left the subject.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator yield to me to continue it for a moment?

Mr. LODGE. I do not desire to yield for protracted debate.

Mr. McKELLAR. What I have in mind will not involve protracted debate. I merely desire to read into the Record at this point an excerpt from a statement of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

Mr. LODGE. I think that can properly be read when the question comes up again, can it not?

Mr. McKELLAR. Unless the Senator is particularly anxious to have an executive session with closed doors at this moment, I should like to have the excerpt go in the Record at this point so that it may appear in connection with the remarks of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. LODGE. Very well.

Mr. FERNALD. I will inquire of the Senator how long it will take?

Mr. McKELLAR. About half a minute.

Mr. FERNALD. Very well, let it be read.

Mr. McKELLAR. I quote from the remarks delivered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] on the 11th of July, 1921, as follows:

I am one who has given a great deal of thought and attention to this subject.

Referring to the collection of the foreign debt.

With me it is not a question of whether we can collect the money. Of course, we can force the money out of England; of course, we can make France pay; of course, we can make some of the other countries pay. The question with me is whether it is for the best interests of the United States to do it. I say to the Senator without a moment's hesitation that it would be the very worst thing in the world for the United States to take that position.

I have not the time now, but I am going to take about an hour's time of the Senate within a very short time, and I think I can convince the Senate that if that policy were to be pursued it would be the absolute ruin of the foreign commerce of the United States.

I submit that for the purpose of showing the attitude of one of the commissioners who has been appointed by the President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate resumes legislative business, and the Chair lays before the Senate bills from the House of Representatives for reference.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were each read twice by title and referred as indicated below:

H. R. 9597. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the President to provide housing for war needs," approved May 16, 1918; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

H. R. 10193. An act extending time for allotments on the Crow Reservation; protecting certain members of the Five Civilized Tribes; relief of Indians occupying certain lands in Arizona, New Mexico, and California; issuing patents in certain cases; establishing a revolving fund on the Rosebud Reservation; memorial to Indians of the Rosebud Reservation killed in the World War; conferring authority on the Secretary of the Interior as to alienation in certain Indian allotments, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

THE MUSCLE SHOALS PLANT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting an offer made by the Alabama Power Co., proposing to complete the Wilson Dam at Muscle Shoals, Ala., and to administer the Government's property at that point, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the Ketchikan (Alaska) Commercial Club, favoring the enactment of legislation to perpetuate and protect the salmon fisheries in Alaska, which was referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions.

Mr. LODGE presented a resolution adopted at a mass meeting held under the auspices of the Massachusetts Branch of the National Council for Reduction of Armament, of Boston, Mass., favoring prompt ratification of the treaties prepared by the Conference on Limitation of Armament, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CAPPER presented a petition of sundry citizens of Morris County, Kans., praying for the enactment of legislation reviving the Government Grain Corporation, so as to stabilize prices of certain farm products, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. HARRIS presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from the Kiwanis Club of Atlanta, Ga., by J. Sherrard Kennedy, president, praying for acceptance of the proposals of Henry Ford relative to the Muscle Shoals project, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Tifton (Ga.) Board of Trade, favoring acceptance of the proposals of Henry Ford relative to the Muscle Shoals project, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. LADD presented a resolution adopted by the North Dakota Society of Engineers, at Jamestown, N. Dak., February 8, 1922, favoring the improvement of the St. Lawrence-Great Lakes waterway so as to accommodate ocean-going vessels, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a resolution adopted by a meeting of the North Dakota Wheat Growers' Association at Grand Forks, N. Dak., February 15, 1922, favoring revival of the Government Grain Corporation, so as to stabilize prices of certain farm products, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented the petitions of Jacob Severson and seven others of Chantapeta, Russell Tollis and 40 others of Omeme and vicinity, and Nels H. Nestrum and 26 others of Epworth, all in the State of North Dakota, praying for the enactment of legislation reviving the Government Grain Corporation, so as to stabilize prices of certain farm products, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. NORBECK presented petitions of sundry citizens of Dallas, Freeman, Burke, Winner, Marion Junction, Bryant, Lemmon, Gregory, Bonesteel, Artesian, Letcher, Astoria, Wallace, Bradley, Garden City, Florence, Lily, St. Charles, Herrick, Woonsocket, Bijou Hills, Hammer, New Effington, White Rock, Rosholt, Victor, Putney, Columbia, Bath, Houghton, Gettysburg, Lebanon, Rutland, Colman, Brookings, Flandreau, Dell Rapids, Frederick, Claire City, Sisseton, Veblen, South Shore, Britton, Lake City, Kidder, Hillhead, Spain, Amherst, Cuthbert, Newark, Bancroft, Manchester, Osceola, Willow Lakes, Pukwana, Kimball, Hecla, Letcher, Wessington, Westport, Aberdeen, Northville, Howard, Winfred, Vilas, Newell, Plana, and Eden, all in the State of South Dakota, praying for the enactment of legislation reviving the Government Grain Corporation, so as to stabilize prices of certain farm products, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a resolution adopted at a meeting of the board of administration of the United Automobile, Aircraft & Vehicle Works of America, Local No. 127, favoring the passage of Senate bill 2717, the so-called France bill, for the forwarding of surplus war material now held by the Army and Navy to the famine-stricken regions of Russia, China, and the Near East, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Detroit, Highland Park, and Milford, all in the State of Michigan, favoring prompt acceptance of the proposals of Henry Ford relative to the Muscle Shoals project, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. ROBINSON:

A bill (S. 3182) granting an increase of pension to George A. Joyner; to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (S. 3183) granting renewal and extension of certain patents to I. H. Larr; to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. TOWNSEND:

A bill (S. 3184) for the relief of Robert Guy Robinson (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A bill (S. 3185) granting an increase of pension to James Q. Bullard (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 3186) granting a pension to Emeline J. Whitmore (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. TOWNSEND:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 167) authorizing the Postmaster General to enlarge the building used by the Post Office Department equipment shops in the city of Washington, D. C.; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

EXECUTIVE SESSION WITH CLOSED DOORS.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business with closed doors.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 20 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, February 23, 1922, at 12 o'clock meridian.

PATENT CONVENTION WITH GERMANY.

In secret executive session this day the following resolution was agreed to by two-thirds of the Senators present, and, on motion of Mr. LODGE, the injunction of secrecy was removed therefrom:

Whereas under the treaty concluded between the United States and Germany, signed on August 25, 1921, to restore friendly relations between the two nations the right is secured to the United States to revive, by giving notice to Germany, any treaty or convention in force between the two nations prior to the outbreak of war: Be it

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the giving of notice by the President to revive the patent convention concluded on February 23, 1909, between the United States and the German Empire.

EXTRADITION TREATY WITH COSTA RICA.

In secret executive session this day the following treaty was ratified, and, on motion of Mr. BRANDEGEE, the injunction of secrecy was removed therefrom:

TO THE SENATE:

I transmit herewith, to the end that I may receive the advice and consent of the Senate to its ratification, a treaty of extradition between the United States and Costa Rica, signed at San Jose January 21, 1922.

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 15, 1922.

THE PRESIDENT:

The undersigned, the Secretary of State, has the honor to lay before the President, with a view to its transmission to the Senate to receive the advice and consent of that body to its ratification, if his judgment approves thereof, a treaty of extradition between the United States and Costa Rica, signed at San Jose January 21, 1922.

Respectfully submitted.

CHARLES E. HUGHES.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, February 13, 1922.

The Republics of the United States of America and Costa Rica, desiring to assure the prompt and efficient action of justice in punishing delinquents who attempt to escape the penalty prescribed by the laws of one country by taking refuge in the other, have resolved to conclude a treaty of extradition. For that purpose they have named as their respective plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States of America; Mr. Walter C. Thurston, chargé d'affaires ad interim of the United States of America in Costa Rica; and

The President of the Republic of Costa Rica, the secretary of state in the office of foreign relations, Licentiate don Alejandro Alvarado Quiros; who, after having mutually communicated their full powers, and they being found in good and due form, have stipulated as follows:

ARTICLE I.

It is agreed that the Government of the United States and the Government of Costa Rica shall, upon mutual requisition duly made as herein provided, deliver up to justice any person who may be charged with or may have been convicted of any of the crimes specified in Article II of this convention committed within the jurisdiction of one of the contracting parties while said person was actually within such jurisdiction when the crime was committed, and who shall seek an asylum or shall be found within the territories of the other, provided that such surrender shall take place only upon such evidence of criminality as according to the laws of the place where the fugitive or person so charged shall be found would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial if the crime or offense had been there committed.

ARTICLE II.

Persons shall be delivered up according to the provisions of this convention who shall have been charged with or convicted of any of the following crimes:

1. Murder, comprehending the crimes designated by the terms of parricide, assassination, manslaughter, when voluntary, poisoning, or infanticide, as well as the attempt to commit these crimes.

2. Rape, abortion, carnal knowledge of children under the age of 12 years.

3. Bigamy.

4. Arson.

5. Willful and unlawful destruction or obstruction of railroads, which endangers human life.

6. Crimes committed at sea:

(a) Piracy, as commonly known and defined by the laws of nations, or by statute;

(b) Wrongfully sinking or destroying a vessel at sea or attempting to do so;

(c) Mutiny or conspiracy by two or more members of the crew or other persons on board of a vessel on the high seas for the purpose of rebelling against the authority of the captain or commander of such vessel or by fraud or violence taking possession of such vessel;

(d) Assault on board ships upon the high seas with intent to do bodily harm.

7. Burglary, defined to be the act of breaking into and entering the house of another in the nighttime with intent to commit a felony therein.

8. The act of breaking into and entering into the offices of the Government and public authorities, or the offices of banks, banking houses, savings banks, trust companies, insurance companies, or other buildings not dwellings with intent to commit a felony therein.

9. Robbery, defined to be the act of feloniously and forcibly taken from the person of another goods or money by violence or by putting him in fear.

10. Forgery or the utterance of forged papers.

11. The forgery or falsification of the official acts of the Government or public authority, including courts of justice, or the uttering or fraudulent use of any of the same.

12. The fabrication of counterfeit money, whether coin or paper, counterfeit titles or coupons of public debt, created by National, State, Provincial, Territorial, Local, or Municipal Governments, bank notes, or other instruments of public credit, counterfeit seals, stamps, dies, and marks of State or public administrations, and the utterance, circulation, or fraudulent use of the above-mentioned objects.

13. Embezzlement or criminal malversation committed within the jurisdiction of one or the other party by public officers or depositaries, where the amount embezzled exceeds $200 (or Costa Rican equivalent).

14. Embezzlement by any person or persons hired, salaried, or employed, to the detriment of their employers or principals, when the crime or offense is punishable by imprisonment or other corporal punishment by the laws of both countries, and where the amount embezzled exceeds $200 (or Costa Rican equivalent).

15. Kidnaping of minors or adults, defined to be the abduction or detention of a person or persons, in order to exact money from them or their families, or for any other unlawful end.

16. Larceny, defined to be the theft of effects, personal property, or money of the value of $25 or more.

17. Obtaining money, valuable securities, or other property by false pretenses, or receiving any money, valuable securities, or other property knowing the same to have been unlawfully obtained, where the amount of money or the value of the property so obtained or received exceeds $200 (or Costa Rican equivalent).

18. Perjury or subornation of perjury.

19. Fraud or breach of trust by a bailee, banker, agent, factor, trustee, executor, administrator, guardian, director, or officer of any company or corporation, or by anyone in any fiduciary position, where the amount of money or the value of the property misappropriated exceeds $200 (or Costa Rican equivalent).

20. Crimes and offenses against the laws of both countries for the suppression of slavery and slave trading.

21. The extradition is also to take place for participation in any of the aforesaid crimes as an accessory before or after the fact, provided such participation be punishable by imprisonment by the laws of both contracting parties.

ARTICLE III.

The provisions of this convention shall not import claim of extradition for any crime or offense of a political character, nor for acts connected with such crimes or offenses; and no person surrendered by or to either of the contracting parties in virtue of this convention shall be tried or punished for a political crime or offense. When the offense charged comprises the act either of murder or assassination or of poisoning, either consummated or attempted, the fact that the offense was committed or attempted against the life of the sovereign or head of a foreign State, or against the President of either of the signatory Republics, shall not be deemed sufficient to sustain that such a crime or offense was of a political character, or was an act connected with crimes or offenses of a political character.

ARTICLE IV.

No person shall be tried for any crime or offense other than that for which he was surrendered.

ARTICLE V.

A fugitive criminal shall not be surrendered under the provisions hereof when, from lapse of time or other lawful cause, according to the laws of the place within the jurisdiction of which the crime was committed, the criminal is exempt from prosecution or punishment for the offense for which the surrender is asked.

ARTICLE VI.

If a fugitive criminal whose surrender may be claimed pursuant to the stipulation hereof be actually under prosecution, out on bail, or in custody for a crime or offense committed in the country where he has sought asylum, or shall have been convicted thereof, his extradition may be deferred until such proceedings be determined and until he shall have been set at liberty in due course of law.

ARTICLE VII.

If a fugitive criminal claimed by one of the parties hereto shall be also claimed by one or more powers pursuant to treaty provisions on account of crimes committed within their jurisdiction, such criminal shall be delivered to that State whose demand is first received.

ARTICLE VIII.

Under the stipulations of this convention, neither of the contracting parties shall be bound to deliver up its own citizens or subjects. In each Republic, according to their respective laws, shall the citizenship of the delinquent be determined.

ARTICLE IX.

The expense of the arrest, detention, examination, and transportation of the accused shall be paid by the Government which has preferred the demand for extradition.

ARTICLE X.

Everything found in the possession of the fugitive criminal at the time of his arrest, whether being the proceeds of the crime or offense, or which may be material as evidence in making proof of the crime, shall, so far as practicable, according to the laws of either of the contracting parties, be delivered up with his person at the time of the surrender. Nevertheless the rights of a third party with regard to the articles aforesaid shall be duly respected.

ARTICLE XI.

The stipulations of this convention shall be applicable to all territory, whatever may be its situation, belonging to one or the other of the contracting parties or which may be occupied and under the jurisdiction of the same.

Requisitions for the surrender of fugitives from justice shall be made by the respective diplomatic agents of the contracting parties. In the event of the absence of such agents from the country or its seat of government, requisition may be made by superior consular officers.

It shall be competent for such diplomatic or superior consular officers to ask and obtain a mandate or preliminary warrant of arrest for the person whose surrender is sought, whereupon the judges and magistrates of the two Governments shall respectively have power and authority, upon complaint made under oath, to issue a warrant for the apprehension of the person charged, in order that he or she may be brought before such judge or magistrate, that the evidence of criminality may be heard and considered; and if on such hearing the evidence be deemed sufficient to sustain the charge it shall be the duty of the examining judge or magistrate to certify the same to the proper executive authority, that a warrant may issue for the surrender of the fugitive.

If the fugitive criminal shall have been convicted of the crime for which his surrender is asked, a copy of the sentence of the court before which such conviction took place, duly authenticated, shall be produced. If, however, the fugitive is merely charged with crime, a duly authenticated copy of the warrant of arrest in the country where the crime was committed, and of the depositions upon which such warrant may have been issued, shall be produced, with such other evidence or proof as may be deemed competent in the case.

ARTICLE XII.

If when a person accused shall have been arrested in virtue of the mandate or preliminary warrant of arrest, issued by the competent authority as provided in Article XI hereof, and been brought before a judge or a magistrate to the end that the evidence of his or her guilt may be heard and examined as hereinbefore provided, it shall appear that the mandate or preliminary warrant of arrest has been issued in pursuance of a request or declaration received by telegraph from the Government asking for the extradition, it shall be competent for the judge or magistrate, at his discretion, to hold the accused for a period not exceeding two months, so that the demanding Government may have opportunity to lay before such judge or magistrate legal evidence of the guilt of the accused, and if at the expiration of said period of two months such legal evidence shall not have been produced before such judge or magistrate, the person arrested shall be released, provided that the examination of the charges preferred against such accused person shall not be actually going on.

ARTICLE XIII.

In every case of a request made by either of the two contracting parties for the arrest, detention, or extradition of fugitive criminals, the legal officers or fiscal ministry of the country where the proceedings of extradition are had shall assist the officers of the Government demanding the extradition before the respective judges and magistrates by every legal means within their or its power; and no claim whatever for compensation for any of the services so rendered shall be made against the Government demanding the extradition, provided, however, that any officer or officers of the surrendering Government so giving assistance who shall, in the usual course of his or their duty, receive no salary or compensation other than specific fees for services performed, shall be entitled to receive from the Government demanding the extradition the customary fees for the acts or services performed by them, in the same manner and to the same amount as though such acts or services had been performed in ordinary criminal proceedings under the laws of the country of which they are officers.

ARTICLE XIV.

This treaty must be submitted for approval in the form prescribed by the laws of the two countries and shall take effect from the day of the exchange of the ratifications thereof; but either contracting party may at any time terminate it on giving to the other six months' notice of its intention to do so.

The ratifications shall be exchanged in San Jose de Costa Rica or in Washington as soon as possible.

In witness whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the above articles and have hereunto affixed their seals.

Done in duplicate at the city of San Jose de Costa Rica this 21st day of January, 1922.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 22, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we thank Thee that we are Americans, and that the power and the genius of the past, with its great causes, its great sacrifices, and with its great triumphs still remain as our blessed heritage. We give Thee thanks for the memory of him whom we lovingly call "Father of our Country." May we feel the resistless inspiration of his spirit, of his balanced intellect, and of his enlightened understanding that preserved and steadied the infant Government against peril and prejudice. Be Thou the guardian of all those wise principles and sacred traditions which were born out of the loins of our forefathers, and may they always be ours to cherish and defend. To-day may we breathe the proud consciousness of our American citizenship and renew our consecration to free and righteous government. O put Thy hand upon the life and destiny of our Republic, and keep it there until all despotism is dissolved, all cruel edicts repealed, all unjust scepters are broken, and all chains melted and every man walks the earth a crowned free-man and a servant of the Most High. In the name of the Son of Man. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR DEPARTMENTS OF COMMERCE AND LABOR.

Mr. SHREVE, from the Committee on Appropriations, presented a bill (H. R. 10559; Rept. 719) making appropriations for the Departments of Commerce and Labor for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, which was read by title, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the bill.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 1565. An act making eligible for retirement under certain conditions officers of the United States Army other than officers of the Regular Army who incurred physical disability in line of duty while in the service of the United States during the war.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 10267) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2810) to amend and reenact section 113 of chapter 5 of the Judicial Code of the United States as amended and reenacted by an act approved the 22d day of August, 1914.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 1565. An act making eligible for retirement under certain conditions officers of the United States Army other than officers of the Regular Army who incurred physical disability in line of duty while in the service of the United States during the war; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENT TO ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 7158, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference on a bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7158) entitled "An act to amend the Army appropriation act, approved July 11, 1919, so as to release appropriations for the completion of the acquisition of real estate in certain cases, and making additional appropriations therefor."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if I may have the attention of the gentlemen on that side of the House who make requests to go to conference on these bills, I will make the statement again in reference to a policy which

I think ought to be pursued, out of respect to the minority, at least. When a gentleman gets the floor, as the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] has, and asks unanimous consent to disagree to Senate amendments and send a bill to conference, he ought at least in the same statement say that he had consulted with the leader of the minority on the committee and that it was entirely agreeable to him. Unless some such arrangement is made, I will say frankly they can consider one standing objection being made. I think it is a reasonable request, and unless you make some such statement—

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. Certainly.

Mr. KAHN. Unfortunately the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs for the last three months has had a daily session with his committee and he has not been able to be over here—

Mr. GARNER. I am not sure whether it is an unfortunate affair or not.

Mr. KAHN. I will say that the gentlemen of the minority have, at any rate, agreed that this should go to conference.

Mr. GARNER. Has the gentleman consulted the minority leaders as to its going to conference?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. And it is agreeable to them?

Mr. KAHN. I understand it is, and I am going to ask the Speaker—

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The SPEAKER appointed the following conferees: Mr. McKENZIE, Mr. GREENE of Vermont, and Mr. FIELDS.

THE BATTLE OF TRENTON.

The SPEAKER. By a special order for to-day, immediately after the reading of the Journal the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WATSON] is allowed 40 minutes in which to address the House on the subject of the Battle of Trenton. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized. [Applause.]

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Speaker, after Washington was appointed Commander in Chief of the Continental Army he realized the superior strength of the British forces. His retreat to the neighborhood of Trenton was evidence of his wisdom and generalship, as he would still be within reach of New Jersey, Philadelphia, New England, and the South. This maneuver of Washington resulted in the Battle of Trenton, which was the most important event toward winning the war for American independence. Therefore I have taken for my subject

THE BATTLE OF TRENTON.

The history of civilization's progress has been marked by great wars. The decisive and final battle of each war was universally won by the nation representing the higher inspirations of human conduct, of liberty, and of the unfolding of learning and culture. Thus the world has advanced from the earliest ages to the present hour.

No battle in the annals of war was so strategic as that of Trenton, nor the victory so far-reaching in its effect upon the policies of governments.

Congress, on the 2d of July, 1775, ordered Washington to Cambridge to assume command of the Continental Army, numbering 17,000 men, and to advance immediately to Boston. His soldiers untrained and undisciplined, his officers unfamiliar with military tactics, with raw recruits to take the places of deserters and of those whose time of service had expired, forced Washington to adopt a policy of retreat, rather than that of aggression, during the whole period of the war.

Washington withdrew from Boston and marched to New York, where he hoped to expel the British and to hold that important vantage ground. Lord Howe contested the position held by the American Army. Washington was compelled to retreat from the east bank of the Hudson River, and, favored by the protection of a fog, made a rapid march to New Jersey. Washington's military strength, due to the casualties of war, was reduced to 5,500 men. The rear guard of his army remained near the village of Hackensack, but quickly followed the main troops, and after crossing the Hackensack River burned the bridge. This delayed the British advance guard and gave the Continental Army the advantage of a day. Washington was pursued in his retreat across New Jersey by Cornwallis with an army of 12,000 men. The British did not press close upon Washington, as he was three weeks reaching Trenton, which distance he could have readily accomplished in four days. Cornwallis remonstrated against the slow pursuit and asked permission of Gen. Howe to make an attack. Howe replied he would give orders without delay. This he failed to do, which provoked the criticism that he "had calculated with the greatest accuracy the exact time necessary for his enemy to make the escape."

Washington, upon arrival at Princeton, asked his adjutant general, Reed, of Pennsylvania:

Should we retreat to the back counties of Pennsylvania, will we get support?

Reed replied:

If the lower counties are subdued and give up, the back counties will do the same.

Washington, passing his hand over his throat, remarked:

My neck! It was not made for a halter.

He then suggested:

We will go to Augusta County, Va., and carry on a predatory war; if we are overpowered, we will cross the Allegheny Mountains.

Washington had no thought of abandoning the cause of liberty nor the loyal American people, who fought and subscribed their all for an independent nation. [Applause.]

When Washington arrived at Brunswick he ordered Col. Humpton to collect all the boats on the Delaware River for several miles either way from Trenton, and make rafts for the transport of the Army across the river. Washington arrived at Trenton on the afternoon of December 7, and by the morning of the following day he had transferred his troops to Pennsylvania.

Thomas Paine made the march with the Continental Army to the Delaware, and encouraged the soldiers by his writings, which he read daily. Afterward they were printed in the Pennsylvania Journal. One of his campfire bulletins is as follows:

The summer soldier and the sunshine patriot will in this crisis shank from the service of his country, but he that stands now deserves the love and thanks of man and woman.

The Hessian battalion, under command of Col. Rall, marched into Trenton only a few hours after the Continental Army had safely crossed the river. A division corps, under the immediate command of Lord Cornwallis, on the morning of the 9th of December attempted to capture the boats secured to the west bank of the river near Coryells Ferry, but in this it failed, Lord Stirling having placed a strong guard over them. Cornwallis then returned to Trenton, where he ordered a detachment of Hessians, under Col. Rall, to remain there until the river was frozen or suitable boats were transported from the Raritan River.

Washington stationed his Army at McKonky's Ferry on the Delaware River, 10 miles north of Trenton.

This period was the blackest during the war for American independence. A fever of apprehension spread throughout the country. Cornwallis was so sure of victory that he engaged passage for home in order that he might in person carry to the king the welcome news of subduing the rebels. Congress was in session at Philadelphia, but on the 13th of December adjourned to Baltimore. Its proceedings were marked with indifference; the army was rebellious, and had dwindled to an alarmingly small number; hundreds of soldiers deserted; many loyalists believed the war must end in defeat, and turned Tories to save their necks and estates. Residents of New Jersey, to the number of 2,700, appealed to Col. Rall for "protection papers." The following is a copy of one:

To his excellency, Gen. Howe:

Express orders that no person presumes to molest or injure John Harcourt in his person or property. By order of his excellency.

RALL.

DECEMBER 16, 1776.

Gen. Howe wrote to Gen. Germain, the English minister, that "Washington, after January, would become only a skeleton." Rall commented upon Washington's army as "a lot of farmers."

When Gen. Charles Lee retreated from New York, Washington ordered him to join his army. Lee was jealous of Washington. He either ignored or did not receive the dispatches, and stationed his troops at Morristown, N. J., 40 miles north of Trenton. Gen. Lee made his residence, a few miles from where he camped, his headquarters. While writing a letter to Gen. Gates, in condemnation of the Commanding General, his home was surrounded by a small British detachment and he was taken prisoner. Lee's unfinished letter also portrayed the state of the army.

Entre nous, a certain great man is most damnably deficient. He has thrown me in a situation where I have my choice of difficulties. If I stay in this Province, I risk myself and army; if I do not stay, the Province is lost forever. I have neither guides, medicines, money, shoes, or stockings. I must act with great circumspection. Tories are in my front, rear, and in my flanks; the mass of the people is strongly contaminated; in short, unless something which I do not expect turns up, we are lost. Our counsels have been weak to the last degree.

Washington knew that Lee was ambitious to supplant him and was directing his influence to that end, and that many Members of Congress demurred against the danger of military ascendancy when unlimited power was extended to him. Washington's magnanimous character and noble spirit elevated his mind above all hatred and revenge, which enabled him to conquer and to subdue. [Applause.]

Gen. Sullivan, next in rank, assumed command of Lee's troops and immediately crossed the river to Pennsylvania and joined Washington's division.

Washington evidently had not planned his attack on Trenton when he wrote to Congress, December 12, 1776, making this appeal:

Ten days more will put an end to the existence of the army. This is not a time to stand upon expenses. Our funds are not the only object of consideration. If any good officers offer to raise men upon continental pay and establishment at this quarter, I shall encourage them to do regiment work when they have done it. If Congress disapproves of the procedure, they will please signify it, as I mean it for the best. It may be that I am going a good deal out of the line of my duty to adopt these measures or to advise thus freely. A character to lose, an estate to forfeit, the inestimable blessings of liberty at stake, and a life devoted must be my excuse.

[Applause.]

Washington's army at this time was destitute. The soldiers were without warm clothing or sufficient food. The fatigues of the service had unfitted them for an engagement, and the magazines were short of ammunition and rifles.

Washington conceived the idea of attacking Trenton on Christmas night, at an hour when the Hessians would probably be a little twisted after celebrating the day. "The Pomeroy letter," dated the 22d of December, written by Adj. Gen. Reed to Washington, doubtless determined his decision.

This is called the Pomeroy letter because Pomeroy was a spy in the Continental Army. Adj. Gen. Reed sent him to locate the British forces in New Jersey. When Pomeroy made the report, Gen. Reed wrote the following letter, and Pomeroy conveyed it to Washington:

We are of the opinion, my dear General, that something must be attempted to revive our expiring credit, give our cause some degree of reputation, and prevent a total depreciation of the Continental money, which is coming on very fast; that even a failure can not be more fatal than to remain in our present situation, in that some enterprise must be undertaken in our present circumstances, or we must give up the cause.

Washington did not move his army from McKonky's Ferry. His headquarters were 5 miles back in the country; his generals—Lord Stirling, Knox, Hamilton, Sullivan, and Greene—were located within a few miles of the valley of concentration, not far from the place of embarkation.

Washington dispatched Gen. Gates to Bristol, 10 miles south of Trenton, on the Pennsylvania side, but Gates left his regiment without official permission, and proceeded to Baltimore to interest Congress for an independent division, and did not return. Col. Cadwalader, the ranking officer, was ordered to command Gates's division.

After the plans were completed Washington issued his orders to Gen. Ewing and Col. Cadwalader to cross the river on Christmas night, and to guard the roads leading from Trenton south to prevent the Hessians escaping.

Christmas afternoon a Tory from Pennsylvania called at Mr. Hunt's residence in Trenton, where Col. Rall was the guest of the evening, and begged the guard to present him for an interview. This was denied, so he wrote a hurried note, stating Washington would attack Trenton in the morning. Col. Rall, "busy at cards and wine," placed the note unopened in his pocket, considering it of no value.

Washington called his generals together in conference on the evening of December 24 and explained in detail the proposed charge upon the Hessians. On account of the depleted condition of the Army, nearly one-half being unfit for field duty, only 2,600 men were therefore mustered into service, each being provided with three days' rations and 40 rounds of ammunition.

Washington assembled his troops, gave to them the countersign "Victory or death," with strict orders that no man should speak above a whisper. Bowman Hill, a high prominence not far from the encampment, commanding a distant view up and down the river, was selected for the sentinel on Christmas afternoon to signal those in command of the boats immediately to float them down the river and place them in hiding back of an island at the point of embarkation. After dark, Washington started to convey his troops across the river, with the hope of reaching Trenton, a distance of 10 miles, at 5 o'clock the following morning, but was delayed on account of floating ice and the stormy night. Although the width of the river where Washington crossed was only 1,000 feet, it was 3 o'clock before all the troops arrived on the Jersey side. Washington immediately formed his men in line and after a march of 2 miles stopped for breakfast. He then advanced toward Trenton with two divisions, one under his command, with 1,200 men; the other Gen. Sullivan lead, with 1,400 men. Each proceeded by different roads.

Sullivan sent an aid-de-camp to Washington while en route, stating the arms were wet and the flint would not ignite the powder.

Tell your general—

Said Washington—

to use the bayonets and penetrate into the town. I am resolved to take it.

[Applause.]

Both divisions arrived at Trenton at 8 o'clock in the morning, three hours later than previously arranged, which prevented the surprise in the dark, as Washington had planned. Heavy snow of the night covered the ground, which enabled the army to march in silence. Washington was within 2 miles of Trenton before he met the Hessian pickets, who prepared to make a stand, but quickly retreated, having lost two of their number. The firing gave the alarm. The Hessians began slowly to rally, but only to find that Washington had secured the best positions.

Col. Rall was sleeping heavily and his soldiers had not recovered from the orgies of the preceding day. Upon being aroused and hearing the firing Rall rushed to the street and at once realized he was surrounded by Americans. Orders were given to push the cannon ahead, but the advance was only 150 feet when the American artillery forced them back. Gen. Green's division prevented the retreat of the Hessian troops toward Princeton. Lieut. James Monroe—afterwards President of the United States—leading his men, made a quick charge and captured two brass cannon. Monroe was hit by a bullet which severed an artery. Rall led his battalion, but as his men became panic-stricken he was forced to give way and withdrew to a plain back of the town. Rall rallied a second charge, his men started in good order, but again fell back in confusion. In this attack to regain his lost ground Rall was wounded, fell from his horse, and was carried to a near-by church. The Americans were gaining on every side. Many of the Hessians having been killed and wounded, the troops became disorganized and Rall was forced to surrender. Supported by his aides, Rall handed his sword to Washington. [Applause.] The battle lasted 45 minutes. In the afternoon Washington and his staff called upon Rall. Two days later the Hessian died of his wounds.

The American casualties were two officers and two soldiers wounded. Washington captured 1,000 prisoners, 6 brass cannon, 3 ammunition wagons, 40 horses, about 1,000 arms, and 15 army colors.

The Hessians reported 106 killed and wounded and 900 taken prisoners. The total Hessian force was 1,550 men.

In disrobing Col. Rall after he was wounded, an unopened note was found in his pocket, the one sent him by the Tory early Christmas night. When it was read Rall replied:

If I had read it at Mr. Hunt's I would not be here.

Washington recrossed the river and returned to camp at McKonky's Ferry the evening after the battle.

Gen. Ewing and Col. Cadwalader failed to obey the orders of Washington, both believing that he would not undertake the adventure on such a stormy night. Cadwalader on the following day wrote to Washington:

I imagine the badness of the night must have prevented you from passing over as you intended.

Thus the officers of his detachments disregarded his dispatches, and Congress ignored his pressing call for aid.

Washington's generalship, perseverance, and judgment at this period of the war protected the union of the thirteen States and maintained the honor of the early patriots, who pledged their lives and their fortunes for American independence. [Applause.]

Washington a few days after his victory marched the 1,000-Hessian prisoners through the streets of Philadelphia, which had an important moral effect upon those who were inclined to sympathize with the British.

Washington's ruse de guerre was praised by all nations, and at home he was lavished with admiration and congratulations. Lord George Germain, the British colonial minister, said:

All our hopes were blasted by the unhappy affair at Trenton.

The Italian historian Carlo Batto said of him:

All nations shared in the surprise of the Americans. All equally admired and applauded the prudence, the constancy, and noble intrepidity of Gen. Washington. A unanimous voice proclaimed him the savior of his country and extolled him as equal to the most illustrious commanders of antiquity. His name was in the mouth of all. All proclaimed him the Fabius of America.

Mr. Speaker, if man is endowed with divine discernment, then Washington possessed that attribute. He had faith in a duty to perform, unswerving confidence of final victory, and eternal hope that the new Nation, founded upon liberty and justice, would grow in wealth and power. We inherit what Washington and the Battle of Trenton won for America and for human liberty throughout the world. [Great applause.]

WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS.

The SPEAKER. It has been customary on the 22d of February of each year for the Chair to designate a Member to read Washington's Farewell Address. Without objection, the Chair will ask the lady from Oklahoma [Miss ROBERTSON] to perform that duty. [Applause, the Members rising.]

Miss ROBERTSON read Washington's Farewell Address, as follows:

To the people of the United States.

FRIENDS AND FELLOW CITIZENS: The period for a new election of a citizen to administer the executive government of the United States being not far distant, and the time actually arrived when your thoughts must be employed in designating the person who is to be clothed with that important trust, it appears to me proper, especially as it may conduce to a more distinct expression of the public voice, that I should now apprise you of the resolution I have formed, to decline being considered among the number of those, out of whom a choice is to be made.

I beg you, at the same time, to do me the justice to be assured, that this resolution has not been taken, without a strict regard to all the considerations appertaining to the relation which binds a dutiful citizen to his country; and that, in withdrawing the tender of service which silence in my situation might imply, I am influenced by no diminution of zeal for your future interest; no deficiency of grateful respect for your past kindness; but am supported by a full conviction that the step is compatible with both.

The acceptance of, and continuance hitherto in the office to which your suffrages have twice called me, have been a uniform sacrifice of inclination to the opinion of duty, and to a deference for what appeared to be your desire. I constantly hoped that it would have been much earlier in my power, consistently with motives which I was not at liberty to disregard, to return to that retirement from which I had been reluctantly drawn. The strength of my inclination to do this, previous to the last election, had even led to the preparation of an address to declare it to you; but mature reflection on the then perplexed and critical posture of our affairs with foreign nations, and the unanimous advice of persons entitled to my confidence, impelled me to abandon the idea.

I rejoice that the state of your concerns external as well as internal, no longer renders the pursuit of inclination incompatible with the sentiment of duty or propriety; and am persuaded, whatever partiality may be retained for my services, that in the present circumstances of our country, you will not disapprove my determination to retire.

The impressions with which I first undertook the arduous trust, were explained on the proper occasion. In the discharge of this trust, I will only say that I have, with good intentions, contributed toward the organization and administration of the government, the best exertions of which a very fallible judgment was capable. Not unconscious in the outset, of the inferiority of my qualifications, experience, in my own eyes, perhaps still more in the eyes of others, has strengthened the motives to diffidence of myself; and, every day, the increasing weight of years admonishes me more and more, that the shade of retirement is as necessary to me as it will be welcome. Satisfied that if any circumstances have given peculiar value to my services they were temporary, I have the consolation to believe that, while choice and prudence invite me to quit the political scene, patriotism does not forbid it.

In looking forward to the moment which is to terminate the career of my political life, my feelings do not permit me to suspend the deep acknowledgment of that debt of gratitude which I owe to my beloved country, for the many honors it has conferred upon me; still more for the steadfast confidence with which it has supported me; and for the opportunities I have thence enjoyed of manifesting my inviolable attachment, by services faithful and persevering, though in usefulness unequal to my zeal. If benefits have resulted to our country from these services, let it always be remembered to your praise, and as an instructive example in our annals, that under circumstances in which the passions, agitated in every direction, were liable to mislead amidst appearances sometimes dubious, vicissitudes of fortune often discouraging—in situations in which not unfrequently, want of success has countenanced the spirit of criticism,—the constancy of your support was the essential prop of the efforts, and a guarantee of the plans, by which they were effected. Profoundly penetrated with this idea, I shall carry it with me to my grave, as a strong incitement to unceasing vows that heaven may continue to you the choicest tokens of its beneficence—that your union and brotherly affection may be perpetual—that the free Constitution, which is the work of your hands, may be sacredly maintained—that its administration in every department may be stamped with wisdom and virtue—that, in fine, the happiness of the people of these States, under the auspices of liberty, may be made complete by so careful a preservation, and so prudent a use of this blessing, as will acquire to them the glory of recommending it to the applause, the affection, and adoption of every nation which is yet a stranger to it.

Here, perhaps, I ought to stop. But a solicitude for your welfare, which cannot end but with my life, and the apprehension of danger, natural to that solicitude, urge me, on an occasion like the present, to offer to your solemn contemplation, and to recommend to your frequent review, some sentiments which are the result of much reflection, of no inconsiderable observation, and which appear to me all important to the permanency of your felicity as a people. These will be offered to you with the more freedom, as you can only see in them the disinterested warnings of a parting friend, who can possibly have no personal motive to bias his counsel. Nor can I forget, as an encouragement to it, your indulgent reception of my sentiments on a former and not dissimilar occasion.

Interwoven as is the love of liberty with every ligament of your hearts, no recommendation of mine is necessary to fortify or confirm the attachment.

The unity of government which constitutes you one people, is also now dear to you. It is justly so; for it is a main pillar in the edifice of your real independence; the support of your tranquillity at home; your peace abroad; of your safety; of your prosperity; of that very liberty which you so highly prize. But, as it is easy to foresee that, from different causes and from different quarters much pains will be taken, many artifices employed, to weaken in your minds the conviction of this truth; as this is the point in your political fortress against which the batteries of internal and external enemies will be most constantly and actively (though often covertly and insidiously) directed; it is of infinite moment, that you should properly estimate the immense value of your national union to your collective and individual happiness; that you should cherish a cordial, habitual, and immovable attachment to it; accustoming yourselves to think and speak of it as of the palladium of your political safety and prosperity; watching for its preservation with jealous anxiety; discountenancing whatever may suggest even a suspicion that it can, in any event, be abandoned; and indignantly frowning upon the first dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest, or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts.

For this you have every inducement of sympathy and interest. Citizens by birth, or choice, of a common country, that country has a right to concentrate your affections. The name of American, which belongs to you in your national capacity, must always exalt the just pride of patriotism, more than any appellation derived from local discriminations. With slight shades of difference, you have the same religion, manners, habits, and political principles. You have, in a common cause, fought and triumphed together; the independence and liberty you possess, are the work of joint counsels, and joint efforts, of common dangers, sufferings and successes.

But these considerations, however powerfully they address themselves to your sensibility, are greatly outweighed by those which apply more immediately to your interest.—Here, every portion of our country finds the most commanding motives for carefully guarding and preserving the union of the whole.

The north, in an unrestrained intercourse with the south, protected by the equal laws of a common government, finds in the productions of the latter, great additional resources of maritime and commercial enterprise, and precious materials of manufacturing industry.—The south, in the same intercourse, benefiting by the same agency of the north, sees its agriculture grow and its commerce expand. Turning partly into its own channels the seamen of the north, it finds its particular navigation invigorated; and while it contributes, in different ways, to nourish and increase the general mass of the national navigation, it looks forward to the protection of a maritime strength, to which itself is unequally adapted. The east, in a like intercourse with the west, already finds, and in the progressive improvement of interior communications by land and water, will more and more find a valuable vent for the commodities which it brings from abroad, or manufactures at home. The west derives from the east supplies requisite to its growth and comfort—and what is perhaps of still greater consequence, it must of necessity owe the secure enjoyment of indispensable outlets for its own productions, to the weight, influence, and the future maritime strength of the Atlantic side of the Union, directed by an indissoluble community of interest as one nation. Any other tenure by which the west can hold this essential advantage, whether derived from its own separate strength; or from an apostate and unnatural connection with any foreign power, must be intrinsically precarious.

While then every part of our country thus feels an immediate and particular interest in union, all the parts combined cannot fail to find in the united mass of means and efforts, greater strength, greater resource, proportionably greater security from external danger, a less frequent interruption of their peace by foreign nations; and, what is of inestimable value, they must derive from union, an exemption from those broils and wars between themselves, which so frequently afflict neighboring countries not tied together by the same government; which their own rivalry alone would be sufficient to produce, but which opposite foreign alliances, attachments, and intrigues, would stimulate and embitter.—Hence likewise, they will avoid the necessity of those overgrown military establishments, which under any form of government are inauspicious to liberty, and which are to be regarded as particularly hostile to republican liberty. In this sense it is, that your union ought to be considered as a main prop of your liberty, and that the love of the one ought to endeavor to you the preservation of the other.

These considerations speak a persuasive language to every reflecting and virtuous mind, and exhibit the continuance of the union as a primary object of patriotic desire. Is there a doubt whether a common government can embrace so large a sphere? let experience solve it. To listen to mere speculation in such a case were criminal. We are authorized to hope that a proper organization of the whole, with the auxiliary agency of governments for the respective subdivisions, will afford a happy issue to the experiment. It is well worth a fair and full experiment. With such powerful and obvious motives to union, affecting all parts of our country, while experience shall not have demonstrated its impracticability, there will always be reason to distrust the patriotism of those who, in any quarter, may endeavor to weaken its bands.

In contemplating the causes which may disturb our Union, it occurs as matter of serious concern, that any ground should have been furnished for characterizing parties by geographical discriminations,—northern and southern—Atlantic and western; whence designing men may endeavor to excite a belief that there is a real difference of local interests and views. One of the expedients of party to acquire influence within particular districts, is to misrepresent the opinions and aims of other districts. You can not shield yourselves too much against the jealousies and heart burnings which spring from these misrepresentations: they tend to render alien to each other: those who ought to be bound together by fraternal affection. The inhabitants of our western country have lately had a useful lesson on this head: they have seen, in the negotiation by the executive, and in the unanimous ratification by the Senate of the treaty with Spain, and in the universal satisfaction at the event throughout the United States, a decisive proof how unfounded were the suspicions propagated among them of a policy in the general government and in the Atlantic States, unfriendly to their interests in regard to the Mississippi. They have been witnesses to the formation of two treaties, that with Great Britain and that with Spain, which secure to them everything they could desire, in respect to our foreign relations, towards confirming their prosperity. Will it not be their wisdom to rely for the preservation of these advantages on the union by which they were procured? will they not henceforth be deaf to those advisers, if such they are, who would sever them from their brethren and connect them with aliens?

To the efficacy and permanency of your Union, a government for the whole is indispensable. No alliances, however strict, between the parts can be an adequate substitute; they must inevitably experience the infractions and interruptions which all alliances, in all times, have experienced. Sensible of this momentous truth, you have improved upon your first essay, by the adoption of a constitution of government, better calculated than your former, for an intimate union, and for the efficacious management of your common concerns. This government, the offspring of our own choice, uninfluenced and unawed, adopted upon full investigation and mature deliberation, completely free in its principles, in the distribution of its powers, uniting security with energy, and containing within itself a provision for its own amendment, has a just claim to your confidence and your support. Respect for its authority, compliance with its laws, acquiescence in its measures, are duties enjoined by the fundamental maxims of true liberty. The basis of our political systems is the right of the people to make and to alter their constitutions of government.—But the constitution which at any time exists, until changed by an explicit and authentic act of the whole people, is sacredly obligatory upon all. The very idea of the power, and the right of the people to establish government, presuppose the duty of every individual to obey the established government.

All obstructions to the execution of the laws, all combinations and associations under whatever plausible character, with the real design to direct, control, counteract, or awe the regular deliberations and action of the constituted authorities, are destructive of this fundamental principle, and of fatal tendency.—They serve to organize faction, to give it an artificial and extraordinary force, to put in the place of the delegated will of the nation the will of party, often a small but artful and enterprising minority of the community; and, according to the alternate triumphs of different parties, to make the public administration the mirror of the ill concerted and incongruous projects of faction, rather than the organ of consistent and wholesome plans digested by common councils, and modified by mutual interests.

However combinations or associations of the above description may now and then answer popular ends, they are likely, in the course of time and things, to become potent engines, by which cunning, ambitious, and unprincipled men, will be enabled to subvert the power of the people, and to usurp for themselves the reins of government; destroying afterwards the very engines which have lifted them to unjust dominion.

Towards the preservation of your Government and the permanency of your present happy state, it is requisite, not only that you steadily discountenance irregular opposition to its acknowledged authority, but also that you resist with care the spirit of innovation upon its principles, however specious the pretext. One method of assault may be to effect, in the forms of the Constitution, alterations which will impair the energy of the system; and thus to undermine what cannot be directly overthrown. In all the changes to which you may be invited, remember that time and habit are at least as necessary to fix the true character of governments, as of other human institutions:—that experience is the surest standard by which to test the real tendency of the existing constitution of a country:—that facility in changes, upon the credit of mere hypothesis and opinion, exposes to perpetual change from the endless variety of hypothesis and opinion: and remember, especially, that for the efficient management of your common interests in a country so extensive as ours, a government of as much vigor as is consistent with the perfect security of liberty is indispensable. Liberty itself will find in such a government, with powers properly distributed and adjusted, its surest guardian. It is, indeed, little else than a name, where the government is too feeble to withstand the enterprises of faction, to confine each member of the society within the limits prescribed by the laws and to maintain all in the secure and tranquil enjoyment of the rights of person and property.

I have already intimated to you the danger of parties in the state, with particular references to the founding them on geographical discrimination. Let me now take a more comprehensive view, and warn you in the most solemn manner against the baneful effects of the spirit of party generally.

This spirit, unfortunately, is inseparable from our nature, having its root in the strongest passions of the human mind.—It exists under different shapes in all governments, more or less stifled, controlled, or repressed; but in those of the popular form it is seen in its greatest rankness, and is truly their worst enemy.

The alternate domination of one faction over another, sharpened by the spirit of revenge natural to party dissension, which in different ages and countries has perpetrated the most horrid enormities, is itself a frightful despotism.—But this leads at length to a more formal and permanent despotism. The disorders and miseries which result, gradually incline the minds of men to seek security and repose in the absolute power of an individual; and, sooner or later, the chief of some prevailing faction, more able or more fortunate than his competitors, turns this disposition to the purpose of his own elevation on the ruins of public liberty.

Without looking forward to an extremity of this kind, (which nevertheless ought not to be entirely out of sight) the common and continual mischiefs of the spirit of party are sufficient to make it the interest and duty of a wise people to discourage and restrain it.

It serves always to distract the public councils, and enfeeble the public administration. It agitates the community with ill founded jealousies and false alarms; kindles the animosity of one part against another; foment occasional riot and insurrection. It opens the door to foreign influence and corruption, which finds a facilitated access to the government itself through the channels of party passions. Thus the policy and the will of one country are subjected to the policy and will of another.

There is an opinion that parties in free countries are useful checks upon the administration of the government, and serve to keep alive the spirit of liberty. This within certain limits is probably true; and in governments of a monarchical cast, patriotism may look with indulgence, if not with favor, upon the spirit of party. But in those of the popular character, in governments purely elective, it is a spirit not to be encouraged. From their natural tendency, it is certain there will always be enough of that spirit for every salutary purpose. And there being constant danger of excess, the effort ought to be, by force of public opinion, to mitigate and assuage it. A fire not to be quenched, it demands a uniform vigilance to prevent it bursting into a flame, lest instead of warming, it should consume.

It is important likewise, that the habits of thinking in a free country should inspire caution in those intrusted with its administration, to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding in the exercise of the powers of one department, to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism. A just estimate of that love of power and proneness to abuse it which predominate in the human heart, is sufficient to satisfy us of the truth of this position. The necessity of reciprocal checks in the exercise of political power, by dividing and distributing it into different depositories, and constituting each the guardian of the public weal against invasions of the others, has been evinced by experiments ancient and modern: some of them in our country and under our own eyes.—To preserve them must be as necessary as to institute them. If, in the opinion of the people, the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the Constitution designates.—But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this, in one instance, may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil, any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield.

Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism, who should labor to subvert these great pillars of human happiness, these firmest props of the duties of men and citizens. The mere politician, equally with the pious man, ought to respect and to cherish them. A volume could not trace all their connections with private and public felicity. Let it simply be asked, where is the security for property, for reputation, for life, if the sense of religious obligation desert the oaths which are the instruments of investigation in courts of justice? and let us with caution indulge the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion. Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on minds of peculiar structure, reason and experience both forbid us to expect, that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle.

It is substantially true, that virtue or morality is a necessary spring of popular government. The rule, indeed, extends with more or less force to every species of free government. Who that is a sincere friend to it can look with indifference upon attempts to shake the foundation of the fabric?

Promote, then, as an object of primary importance, institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge. In proportion as the structure of a government gives force to public opinion, it should be enlightened.

As a very important source of strength and security, cherish public credit. One method of preserving it is to use it as sparingly as possible, avoiding occasions of expense by cultivating peace, but remembering, also, that timely disbursements, to prepare for danger, frequently prevent much greater disbursements to repel it; avoiding likewise the accumulation of debt, not only by shunning occasions of expense, but by vigorous exertions, in time of peace, to discharge the debts which unavoidable wars may have occasioned, not ungenerously throwing upon posterity the burden which we ourselves ought to bear. The execution of these maxims belongs to your representatives, but it is necessary that public opinion should co-operate. To facilitate to them the performance of their duty, it is essential that you should practically bear in mind, that towards the payment of debts there must be revenue; that to have revenue there must be taxes; that no taxes can be devised which are not more or less inconvenient and unpleasant; that the intrinsic embarrassment inseparable from the selection of the proper object (which is always a choice of difficulties,) ought to be a decisive motive for a candid construction of the conduct of the government in making it, and for a spirit of acquiescence in the measures for obtaining revenue, which the public exigencies may at any time dictate.

Observe good faith and justice towards all nations; cultivate peace and harmony with all. Religion and morality enjoin this conduct, and can it be that good policy does not equally enjoin it? It will be worthy of a free, enlightened, and, at no distant period, a great nation, to give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a people always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence. Who can doubt but, in the course of time and things, the fruits of such a plan would richly repay any temporary advantages which might be lost by a steady adherence to it; can it be that Providence has not connected the permanent felicity of a nation with its virtue? The experiment, at least, is recommended by every sentiment which ennobles human nature. Alas! is it rendered impossible by its vices?

In the execution of such a plan, nothing is more essential than that permanent, inveterate antipathies against particular nations and passionate attachments for others, should be included; and that, in place of them, just and amicable feelings towards all should be cultivated. The nation which indulges towards another an habitual hatred, or an habitual fondness, is in some degree a slave. It is a slave to its animosity or to its affection, either of which is sufficient to lead it astray from its duty and its interest. Antipathy in one nation against another, disposes each more readily to offer insult and injury, to lay hold of slight causes of umbrage, and to be haughty and intractable when accidental or trifling occasions of dispute occur. Hence, frequent collisions, obstinate, envenomed, and bloody contests. The nation, prompted by ill will and resentment, sometimes impels to war the government, contrary to the best calculations of policy. The government sometimes participates in the national propensity, and adopts through passion what reason would reject; at other times, it makes the animosity of the nation subservient to projects of hostility, instigated by pride, ambition, and other sinister and pernicious motives. The peace often, sometimes perhaps the liberty of nations, has been the victim.

So likewise, a passionate attachment of one nation for another produces a variety of evils. Sympathy for the favorite nation, facilitating the illusion of an imaginary common interest, in cases where no real common interest exists, and infusing into one the enmities of the other, betrays the former into a participation in the quarrels and wars of the latter, without adequate inducements or justifications. It leads also to concessions, to the favorite nation, of privileges denied to others, which is apt doubly to injure the nation making the concessions, by unnecessarily parting with what ought to have been retained, and by exciting jealousy, ill will, and a disposition to retaliate in the parties from whom equal privileges are withheld; and it gives to ambitious, corrupted or deluded citizens who devote themselves to the favorite nation, facility to betray or sacrifice the interests of their own country, without odium, sometimes even with popularity; gilding with the appearances of a virtuous sense of obligation, a commendable deference for public opinion, or a laudable zeal for public good, the base or foolish compliances of ambition, corruption, or infatuation.

As avenues to foreign influence in innumerable ways, such attachments are particularly alarming to the truly enlightened and independent patriot. How many opportunities do they afford to tamper with domestic factions, to practice the arts of seduction, to mislead public opinion, to influence or awe the public councils!—Such an attachment of a small or weak, towards a great and powerful nation, dooms the former to be the satellite of the latter.

Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence, (I conjure you to believe me fellow citizens,) the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake; since history and experience prove, that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government. But that jealousy, to be useful, must be impartial, else it becomes the instrument of the very influence to be avoided, instead of a defense against it. Excessive partiality for one foreign nation and excessive dislike for another, cause those whom they actuate to see danger only on one side, and serve to veil and even second the arts of influence on the other. Real patriots, who may resist the intrigues of the favorite, are liable to become suspected and odious; while its tools and dupes usurp the applause and confidence of the people, to surrender their interests.

The great rule of conduct for us, in regard to foreign nations, is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements, let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith:—Here let us stop.

Europe has a set of primary interests, which to us have none, or a very remote relation. Hence, she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves, by artificial ties, in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics, or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities.

Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course. If we remain one people, under an efficient government, the period is not far off when we may defy material injury from external annoyance; when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon, to be scrupulously respected; when belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not lightly hazard the giving us provocation, when we may choose peace or war, as our interest, guided by justice, shall counsel.

Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalry, interest, humor, or caprice?

It is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliance with any portion of the foreign world; so far, I mean, as we are now at liberty to do it; for let me not be understood as capable of patronizing infidelity to existing engagements. I hold the maxim no less applicable to public than private affairs, that honesty is always the best policy. I repeat it, therefore, let those engagements be observed in their genuine sense. But, in my opinion, it is unnecessary and would be unwise to extend them.

Taking care always to keep ourselves by suitable establishments, on a respectable defensive posture, we may safely trust to temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies.

Harmony, and a liberal intercourse with all nations, are recommended by policy, humanity, and interest. But even our commercial policy should hold an equal and impartial hand; neither seeking nor granting exclusive favors or preferences; consulting the natural course of things; diffusing and diversifying by gentle means the streams of commerce, but forcing nothing; establishing with powers so disposed, in order to give trade a stable course, to define the rights of our merchants and to enable the Government to support them, conventional rules of intercourse, the best that present circumstances and mutual opinion will permit, but temporary, and liable to be from time to time abandoned or varied as experience and circumstances shall dictate; constantly keeping in view that it is folly in one nation to look for disinterested favors from another; that it must pay with a portion of its independence for whatever it may accept under that character; that by such acceptance it may place itself in the condition of having given equivalents for nominal favors, and yet of being reproached with ingratitude for not giving more. There can be no greater error than to expect or calculate upon real favors from nation to nation. It is an illusion which experience must cure, which a just pride ought to discard.

In offering to you, my countrymen, these counsels of an old and affectionate friend, I dare not hope they will make the strong and lasting impression I could wish; that they will control the usual current of the passions, or prevent our nation from running the course which has hitherto marked the destiny of nations, but if I may even flatter myself that they may be productive of some partial benefit, some occasional good; that they may now and then recur to moderate the fury of party spirit, to warn against the mischiefs of foreign intrigue, to guard against the impostures of pretended patriotism; this hope will be a full recompense for the solicitude for your welfare by which they have been dictated.

How far, in the discharge of my official duties, I have been guided by the principles which have been delineated, the public records and other evidences of my conduct must witness to you and to the world. To myself, the assurance of my own conscience is, that I have, at least, believed myself to be guided by them.

In relation to the still subsisting war in Europe, my proclamation of the 22d of April, 1793, is the index to my plan. Sanctioned by your approving voice, and by that of your representatives in both houses of congress, the spirit of that measure has continually governed me, uninfluenced by any attempts to deter or divert me from it.

After deliberate examination, with the aid of the best lights I could obtain, I was well satisfied that our country, under all the circumstances of the case, had a right to take, and was bound, in duty and interest, to take a neutral position. Having taken it, I determined, as far as should depend upon me, to maintain it with moderation, perseverance and firmness.

The considerations which respect the right to hold this conduct, it is not necessary on this occasion to detail. I will only observe that, according to my understanding of the matter, that right, so far from being denied by any of the belligerent powers, has been virtually admitted by all.

The duty of holding a neutral conduct may be inferred, without any thing more, from the obligation which justice and humanity impose on every nation, in cases in which it is free to act, to maintain inviolate the relations of peace and amity towards other nations.

The inducements of interest for observing that conduct will best be referred to your own reflections and experience. With me, a predominant motive has been to endeavor to gain time to our country to settle and mature its yet recent institutions, and to progress, without interruption, to that degree of strength, and consistency which is necessary to give it, humanly speaking, the command of its own fortunes.

Though in reviewing the incidents of my administration, I am unconscious of intentional error, I am nevertheless too sensible of my defects not to think it probable that I may have committed many errors. Whatever they may be, I fervently beseech the Almighty to avert or mitigate the evils to which they may tend. I shall also carry with me the hope that my country will never cease to view them with indulgence; and that, after forty-five years of my life dedicated to its service, with an upright zeal, the faults of incompetent abilities will be consigned to oblivion, as myself must soon be to the mansions of rest.

Relying on its kindness in this as in other things, and actuated by that fervent love towards it, which is so natural to a man who views in it the native soil of himself and his progenitors for several generations; I anticipate with pleasing expectation that retreat in which I promise myself to realize, without alloy, the sweet enjoyment of partaking, in the midst of my fellow citizens, the benign influence of good laws under a free government—the ever favorite object of my heart, and the happy reward, as I trust, of our mutual cares, labors and dangers.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES,
17th September, 1796.

[Prolonged applause, the Members rising.]

RELICS OF WASHINGTON AND FRANKLIN.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to ask unanimous consent to call up Senate joint resolution 137, transferring to the custody of the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution certain relics of Washington and Franklin now in the possession of the Department of State.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WALSH). The gentleman calls up Senate joint resolution 137, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 137) transferring to the custody of the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution certain relics now in the possession of the Department of State.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution in full.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas, by a joint resolution of the Senate and House of Representatives, approved March 4, 1844, the sword of George Washington and the staff of Benjamin Franklin were accepted in the name of the Nation as gifts from Samuel T. Washington and deposited for safe-keeping in the Department of State; and

Whereas, by a joint resolution of the Senate and House of Representatives, approved February 28, 1855, the sword of Andrew Jackson was accepted in the name of the Nation as a gift from the family of Gen. Robert Armstrong and deposited for safe-keeping in the Department of State; and

Whereas it is represented by the Secretary of State that he has no appropriate place for the exhibition of these relics: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, authorized to transfer the said relics to the custody of the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution for safe-keeping and exhibition in the National Museum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the Senate joint resolution.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the preamble.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Indiana yield?

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. May I ask the gentleman from Indiana to yield to me five minutes?

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Yes. I promised to yield to the gentleman five minutes. I wish to say that the committee unanimously approved a resolution which is identical, word for word, with the Senate joint resolution, and had unanimously reported it to the House. I will yield to the gentleman five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, as has been stated, the single purpose of this resolution is to transfer from the State Department to the National Museum the articles which are enumerated—the sword of Washington, the sword of Jackson, and the staff of Franklin, which Franklin had given to Washington.

It may not be out of place to spend a few minutes in referring to what occurred when these priceless relics were accepted for the United States by Congress.

The resolution accepting the Washington sword and the Franklin staff was passed by both Houses February 7, 1843. The proceedings were most dignified and impressive. The ordinary business was laid aside in the Senate, which was addressed by Mr. Archer, of Virginia. The scene here in the House at the moment when Mr. George W. Summers, of Virginia, began his speech of presentation is described in the Congressional Globe, as follows:

As Mr. Summers arose, "all eyes were at once turned to him, and the whole House was at once hushed into silence. The galleries were densely filled with an anxious and attentive auditory, which had collected in anticipation of the interesting proceedings which were about to be witnessed. Many Senators occupied seats amongst the Members of the House, and some of the representatives of foreign powers, accredited to this Government in diplomatic relations, were ranged below the bar, and all listened with profound stillness while the honorable gentleman from Virginia spoke."

Mr. Summers, a member of whose family now occupies a seat in this House, was a man of extraordinary vigor and eloquence. Although he represented the Kanawha district, which is now a part of West Virginia, he was a native of the county of Fairfax, Va., which treasures as its greatest historic possession the home and tomb of Washington. When Mr. Summers had concluded there was a notable and brilliant address by John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts. The resolution, because of some inadvertence, not having been formally approved, was reenacted by both Houses on the 4th day of March, 1844, and approved the same day.

The resolution accepting the Jackson sword passed both Houses February 26, 1855, the speech of presentation being delivered in the Senate by Lewis Cass, of Michigan, who, as we all know, was one of the foremost statesmen of that time. The resolution was approved February 28, 1855.

I ask permission to print with my remarks the addresses of Senator Cass and Representative Summers. I shall not attempt to add any further word of eulogy to that which they contain. With reference, however, to Washington and Franklin, who were so closely associated and whose names we are now linking together, there is a fact perhaps not commonly noted which attracts the attention of the traveler who searches in the mother country for American origins. In Northamptonshire, which is a beautiful part of England, he finds that at the village of Brington, a little east of the city of Northampton, is the home and burial place of Lawrence Washington, who died not long after the close of the reign of Queen Elizabeth. He was Gen. Washington's lineal ancestor. He finds also that a little west of the city of Northampton, at the village of Ecton, there lived and are buried the progenitors of Benjamin Franklin. The villages of Brington and Ecton are within 12 miles of each other. Thus we may say that from the same far-off locality sprang two great forces which united here in the successful struggle for independence and free institutions. [Applause.]

The speeches of Representative Summers and Senator Cass follow:

ADDRESS OF HON. GEORGE W. SUMMERS IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 7, 1843.

Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of discharging an office not connected with the ordinary business of a legislative assembly. Yet, in asking permission to interrupt, for a moment, the regular order of parliamentary proceedings, I can not doubt that the proposition which I have to submit will prove as gratifying as it may be unusual.

Mr. Samuel T. Washington, a citizen of Kanawha County, in the Commonwealth of Virginia, and one of my constituents, has honored me with the commission of presenting, in his name and on his behalf, to the Congress of the United States and through that body to the people of the United States, two most interesting and valuable relics connected with the past history of our country and with men whose achievements, both in the field and in the cabinet, best illustrate and adorn our annals.

One is the sword worn by George Washington, first as a colonel in the colonial service of Virginia in Forbes's campaign against the French and Indians, and afterwards during the whole period of the War of Independence as commander in chief of the American Army.

It is a plain cuttleau, or hanger, with a green hilt and silver guard. On the upper ward of the scabbard is engraved "J. Bailey, Fishkill." It is accompanied by a buckskin belt, which is secured by a silver buckle and clasp, whereon are engraved the letters "G. W." and the figures "1757." These are all of the plainest workmanship, but substantial and in keeping with the man and with the times to which they belonged.

The history of this sword is perfectly authentic, and leaves no shadow of doubt as to its identity.

The last will and testament of George Washington, bearing date on the 9th day of February, 1799, contains, among a great variety of bequests, the following clause: "To each of my nephews, William Augustine Washington, George Lewis, George Steplow Washington, Bushrod Washington, and Samuel Washington, I give one of the swords, or cuttleaus of which I may die possessed; and they are to choose in the order they are named. These swords are accompanied with an injunction not to unsheathe them for the purpose of shedding blood, except it be for self-defense or in defense of their country and its rights; and, in the latter case, to keep them unsheathed and prefer falling with them in their hands to the relinquishment thereof."

In the distribution of the swords, hereby devised, among the five nephews therein enumerated, the one now presented fell to the lot of Samuel Washington, the devisee last named in the clause of the will which I have just read.

This gentleman, who died a few years since, in the county of Kanawha, and who was the father of Samuel T. Washington, the donor, I knew well. I have often seen this sword in his possession, and received from him the following account of the manner in which it became his property, in the division made among the devisees:

He said that he knew it to have been the side arm of Gen. Washington during the Revolutionary War—not that used on occasions of parade and review, but the constant service sword of the great chief—that he had himself seen Gen. Washington wear this identical sword—he presumed for the last time—when, in 1794, he reviewed the Virginia and Maryland forces, then concentrated at Cumberland, under the command of Gen. Lee, and destined to cooperate with the Pennsylvania and New Jersey troops, then assembled at Bedford, in suppressing what has been called "the whisky insurrection."

Gen. Washington was at that time President of the United States, and, as such, was Commander in Chief of the Army. It is known that it was his intention to lead the Army in person on that occasion, had he found it necessary; and he went to Bedford and Cumberland prepared for that event. The condition of things did not require it, and he returned to his civil duties at Philadelphia.

Mr. Samuel Washington held the commission of a captain at that time himself, and served in that campaign, many of the incidents of which he has related to me.

He was anxious to obtain this particular sword, and preferred it to all the others, among which was the ornamented and costly present from the great Frederick.

At the time of the division among the nephews, without intimating what his preference was, he jocosely remarked, "that, inasmuch as he was the only one of them who had participated in military service, they ought to permit him to take choice." This suggestion was met in the same spirit in which it was made; and the choice being awarded him, he chose this, the plainest and intrinsically the least valuable of any, simply because it was "the battle sword."

I am also in possession of the most satisfactory evidence, furnished by Col. George Washington, of Georgetown, the nearest male relative of Gen. Washington now living, as to the identity of this sword. His information was derived from his father, William Augustine Washington, the devisee first named in the clause of the will which I have read, from his uncle, the late Judge Bushrod Washington, of the Supreme Court, and Maj. Lawrence Lewis, the acting executor of Gen. Washington's will; all of whom concurred in the statement that the true service sword was that selected by Capt. Samuel Washington. It remained in this gentleman's possession until his death, esteemed by him the most precious memento of his illustrious kinsman. It then became the property of his son, who, animated by that patriotism which so characterized the "father of his country," has consented that such a relic ought not to be appropriated by an individual citizen, and has instructed me, his representative, to offer it to the Nation, to be preserved in its public depositories, as the common property of all; since its office has been to achieve and defend the common liberty of all.

He has, in like manner, requested me to present this cane to the Congress of the United States, deeming it not unworthy the public acceptance.

This was once the property of the philosopher and patriot, Benjamin Franklin.

By a codicil to his last will and testament we find it thus disposed of:

"My fine crab-tree walking stick, with a gold head, curiously wrought in the form of the cap of liberty, I give to my friend and the friend of mankind, Gen. Washington. If it were a scepter, he has merited it and would become it."

Gen. Washington in his will devises this cane as follows:

"Item. To my brother, Charles Washington, I give and bequeath the gold-headed cane left me by Dr. Franklin in his will."

Capt. Samuel Washington was the only son of Charles Washington, the devisee, from whom he derived, by inheritance, this interesting memorial, and having transmitted it to his son, Samuel T. Washington, the latter thus seeks to bestow it worthily by associating it with the battle sword in a gift to his countrymen.

I cordially concur with Mr. Washington in the opinion that they each merit public preservation; and I obey with pleasure his wishes in here presenting them, in his name, to the Nation.

Let the sword of the hero and the staff of the philosopher go together. Let them have place among the proudest trophies and most honored memorials of our national achievements.

Upon the staff once leaned the sage of whom it has been said, "He snatched the lightning from heaven and the scepter from tyrants."

A mighty arm once wielded this sword in a righteous cause, even unto the dismemberment of empire. In the hand of Washington this was the "sword of the Lord and of Gideon." It was never drawn except in defense of the public liberty. It was never sheathed until a glorious and triumphant success returned it to the scabbard, without stain of cruelty or dishonor upon its blade. It was never surrendered, except to that country which bestowed it.

ADDRESS OF HON. LEWIS CASS IN THE SENATE FEBRUARY 26, 1856.

Mr. CASS. Mr. President, I must ask the indulgence of the Senate for requesting that its usual business may be suspended, in order to give me opportunity to discharge a trust which has been committed to me; a trust I have not the heart to decline, but which I knew I had not the power to fulfill as such a mission should be fulfilled. I hold in my hand the sword of Gen. Jackson, which he wore in all his expeditions while in the military service of the country, and which was his faithful companion in his last and crowning victory, when New Orleans was saved from the grasp of a rapacious and powerful enemy, and our Nation from the disgrace and disaster which defeat would have brought in its train. When the hand of death was upon him, Gen. Jackson presented this sword to his friend the late Gen. Armstrong as a testimonial of his high appreciation of the services, worth, and courage of that most estimable citizen and distinguished soldier, whose desperate valor on one occasion stayed the tide of Indian success and saved the Army from destruction. The family of the lamented depostary, now that death has released him from the guardianship of this treasure of patriotism, are desirous it should be surrendered to the custody of the National Legislature, believing that to be the proper disposition of the memorial which, in all time to come, will be a cherished one for the American people. To carry that purpose into effect I now offer it in their name to Congress.

Mr. President, this is no doubtful relic whose identity depends upon uncertain tradition, and which owes its interest to an impulsive imagination. Its authenticity is established beyond controversy by the papers which accompany it, and it derives its value as well from our knowledge of its history as from its associations with the great captain whose days of toil and nights of trouble it shared and witnessed, and who never drew it from its scabbard but to defend the honor and the interests of his country.

This is neither the time nor the place to portray those great traits of character which gave to Gen. Jackson the ascendancy that no man ever denied who approached him, and that wonderful influence with his countrymen which marked almost his whole course, from his entrance upon a public career till the grave closed upon his life and his labors, and left him to that equality which the mighty and the lowly must find at last. Still from my personal and official relations with him—and I trust I may add, from his friendship toward me, of which I have many proofs—I can not withhold the acknowledgment of the impression which his high qualities made upon me, and which becomes more lasting and profound as time is doing its work of separation from the days of my intercourse with him.

I have been no careless observer of the men of my time, who, controlled by events, or controlling them, have stood prominent among them; and will occupy distinguished positions in the annals of the age; and circumstances have extended my opportunities of examination to the Old World, as well as to the new. But, I say, and with a deep conviction of its truth, that I never have been brought into contact with a man who possessed more native sagacity, more profundity of intellect, higher power of observation, or greater probity of purpose, more ardor of patriotism, nor more firmness of resolution, after he had surveyed his position, and occupied it, than the lamented subject of this feeble tribute, not to him but to truth. And I will add that during the process of determination upon important subjects he was sometimes slow and generally cautious and inquiring; and he has more than once told me, anxious and uneasy, not seldom passing the night without sleep; but he was calm in his mind and inflexible in his will when reflection had given place to decision. The prevailing opinion that he was rash and hasty in his conclusions is founded upon an erroneous impression of his habit of thought and action, upon a want of discrimination between his conduct before and after his judgment had pronounced upon his course.

This is not the first offering of a similar nature which has been laid upon the altar of our country, with the sanction of the legislative department of the Government. Some years since another precious relic was deposited here, the sword of him who in life was first in the affections of his countrymen and in death is now the first in their memory. I need not name his name. It is written in characters of living light on every heart and springs instinctively to every tongue. His fame is committed to time, his example to mankind, and himself, we may humbly hope, to the reward of the righteous. When centuries shall have passed over us, bringing with them the mutations that belong to the lapse of ages, and our country shall yet be fulfilling, or shall have fulfilled, her magnificent destiny, for good, I devoutly hope, and not for evil, pilgrims from our ocean coasts and our inland seas and from the vast regions which now separate but ere long, by our wonderful progress, must unite them, will come up to the high places of our land, consecrated by days and deeds of worldwide renown. And turning aside to the humble tomb, dearer than this proud Capitol, they will meditate upon the eventful history of their country and will recall the example while they bless the name of Washington.

And on the same occasion was presented the cane of Franklin, which was deposited in our national archives with the sword of his friend and collaborer in the great cause of human rights. Truly and beautifully has it been said that "peace hath its victories as well as war." And never was nobler conquest won than that achieved by the American apprentice, printer, author, statesman, ambassador, philosopher, and, better than all, model of common sense, over one of the most powerful elements in the economy of nature, subduing its might to his own, thus enabling man to answer the sublime interrogatory addressed to Job, "Canst thou send lightnings, that they may go and say unto thee, Here we are?" Yes; they now come at our command and say, "Here we are, ready to do your work." And it was our illustrious countryman who first opened the way for this subjugation of the fire of heaven to the human will. The staff that guided the steps of Franklin and the sword that guarded the person of Washington may well occupy the same repository under the care of the Nation they served and loved and honored.

And now another legacy of departed greatness, another weapon from the armory of patriotism comes to claim its place in the sanctuary assigned to its predecessor and to share with it the veneration of the country in whose defense it was wielded.

The memorial of the first and greatest of our Chief Magistrates, and this memorial of his successor in the administration of the Government, and second only to him in the gratitude and affections of the American people, will lie side by side, united tokens of patriotic self-devotion and of successful military prowess, though they who bore them and gave them value by their services are now tenants of distant and lowly graves, separated by mountains and rivers and valleys. And in ages shut out from our vision by the far-away future, when remote generations, heirs of our heritage of freedom, succeeding to it without the labors and privations of acquisition, shall gaze, as they will gaze, upon these testimonials of victories, timeworn but time honored, they will be carried back by associations to those heroes of early story and will find their love of country strengthened and their pride in her institutions and their confidence in her fate and fortunes increased by this powerful faculty of the mind—a faculty which enables us to triumph over the distant and the future, as well as over the stern realities of the present, gathering around us the mighty dead and the mighty deeds that excited the admiration of mankind, and will ever command their respect and gratitude. And thus will communion be held with the great leaders of our country in war and in peace, who wore these swords in her service, and hallowed them by their patriotism, their valor, and success.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the preamble.

The preamble was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the resolution the third time.

The resolution was read the third time and passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, House joint resolution 272, of similar import, will be laid on the table.

There was no objection.

WASHINGTON ON ADJUSTED COMPENSATION.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. On what subject?

Mr. FISH. I want to read some extracts from a letter of Gen. Washington.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, in view of the interest of the public and for the information of those Members of Congress who are considering the merits of the pending adjusted compensation bill, it seems an appropriate time and occasion on the birthday of George Washington to quote his views on the subject of adjusted compensation for the officers and men of the Revolutionary Army. It will be observed that the sentiment expressed, the very words used such as "debt of honor," and the arguments set forth are almost identical with those advanced by the American Legion of to-day. The main difference being the extent to which Gen. Washington urged compensation for his soldiers, which was far beyond that considered or proposed in the bill now pending in Congress. He advocated half pay for life for his officers, and land donations, exemption from taxation, back pay, and one full year's pay for his men.

The following are a few extracts taken from a congratulatory letter written by him toward the conclusion of the Revolutionary War on June 18, 1783, from his headquarters at Newburgh, N. Y., to the governors of the Thirteen States, giving advice and encouragement:

[Extracts from Washington's letter of congratulation and advice to the governors of the Thirteen States, headquarters, Newburgh, June 18, 1783.]

* * * In this state of absolute freedom and perfect security, who will grudge to yield a very little of his property to support the common interests of society and insure the protection of government? Who does not remember the frequent declarations at the commencement of the war that we should be completely satisfied if, at the expense of one-half, we could defend the remainder of our possessions?

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I regret I can not. I have only five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York declines to yield.

Mr. FISH. I will yield after I am through. I read:

Where is the man to be found who wishes to remain indebted for the defense of his own person and property at the exertions, the bravery, and the blood of others, without making one generous effort to pay the debt of honor and gratitude? In what part of the continent shall we find any man, or body of men, who would not blush to stand up and propose measures purposely calculated to rob the soldier of his stipend and the public creditor of his due? And were it possible that such a flagrant instance of injustice could ever happen, would it not excite the general indignation and tend to bring down upon the authors of such measures the aggravated vengeance of heaven?

* * * For my own part, conscious of having acted while a servant of the public in the manner I conceived best suited to promote the real interest of my country; having, in consequence of my fixed belief, in some measure, pledged myself to the Army, that their country would finally do them complete and ample justice, and not willing to conceal any instance of my official conduct from the eyes of the world,

I have thought proper to transmit to your excellency the inclosed collection of papers relative to the half pay and commutation granted by Congress to the officers of the Army; from these communications my decided sentiment will be clearly comprehended, together with the conclusive reasons which induced me at an early period to recommend the adoption of this measure in the most earnest and serious manner. As the proceedings of Congress, the Army, and myself are open to all, and contain, in my opinion, sufficient information to remove the prejudice and errors which may have been entertained by any, I think it unnecessary to say anything more than just to observe that the resolutions of Congress now alluded to are undoubtedly and absolutely binding upon the United States as the most solemn acts of confederation or legislation.

As to the idea which, I am informed, has in some instances prevailed that the half pay and commutation are to be regarded merely in the odious light of a pension, it ought to be exploded forever; that provision should be reviewed, as it really was, a reasonable compensation offered by Congress at a time they had nothing else to give to officers of the Army for services then to be performed; it was the only means to prevent a total dereliction of the service; it was part of their hire. I may be allowed to say it was the price of their blood and of their independence; it is therefore more than a common debt; it is a debt of honor; it can never be considered as a pension or gratuity nor canceled until it is fairly discharged.

With regard to the distinction between officers and soldiers, it is sufficient that the uniform experience of every nation of the world combined with our own proves the utility and propriety of the discrimination. Rewards in proportion to the aid the public draws from them are unquestionably due to all its servants. In some lines the soldiers have perhaps generally had as ample compensation for their services by the large bounties which have been paid to them as their officers will receive in the proposed commutation; in others, if besides the donation of land, the payment of arrears of clothing and wages (in which article all the component parts of the Army must be put upon the same footing) we take into the estimate the bounties many of the soldiers have received and the gratuity of one year's full pay, which is promised to all, possibly their situation (every circumstance being duly considered) will not be deemed less eligible than that of the officers. Should a further reward, however, be judged equitable, I will venture to assert no man will enjoy greater satisfaction than myself in an exemption from taxes for a limited time (which has been petitioned for in some instances) or any other adequate immunity or compensation granted to the brave defenders of their country's cause, but neither the adoption or rejection of this proposition will in any manner affect, much less militate, against the act of Congress by which they have offered five years' full pay in lieu of the half pay for life which had been before promised to the officers of the Army.

[Applause.]

MARINE INSURANCE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I understand it is not necessary to make a motion to proceed with the consideration of Senate bill 2265, to regulate marine insurance in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, at the point where we discontinued consideration on the last District day?

The SPEAKER. It is not necessary to make the motion. All that the gentleman has to do is to call up the bill and the rule automatically operates.

Mr. CROWTHER rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York rise?

UNITED STATES VETERANS' BUREAU.

Mr. CROWTHER. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. I just want to read a short letter from Mr. Forbes, of the United States Veterans' Bureau, and suggesting an amendment that I would like to make.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes for the purpose indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to call the attention of the gentlemen on the Republican side of the House to this point, that if they are going into the question of discussing the bonus bill to-day, you had better devote the balance of the day to it. I have no objection to the gentleman speaking five minutes, but five minutes after five minutes touching the bonus will inevitably open up the entire subject, and it seems to me that this is not the proper time to do it. The responsibility is upon the Republican organization.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that I do not think it is proper to inject the discussion of the bonus question into the proceedings on a day set aside to honoring the life and works of George Washington. I shall have to object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Speaker, I just want to call attention to an existing condition, as exemplified by this letter with which many of you are familiar. This is in regard to the claim of George Washington Wiswell, formerly a private in the Air Service:

UNITED STATES VETERANS' BUREAU,
Washington, February 16, 1922.

Hon. FRANK CROWTHER,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CROWTHER: In reply to your letter of February 13, 1922, relative to the above-named case, please be advised that it has been adjudged that the evidence on file is insufficient to connect claimant's disability with the service.

The records of this bureau show that he was discharged from service June 23, 1919; that his claim was filed July 14, 1921, which was more than two years after discharge; and that the first evidence on file in this bureau of the existence of pulmonary tuberculosis is the report of examination dated July 16, 1921. Any further evidence that this claimant may wish to submit will receive careful consideration.

All future communications referring to this claim should bear the file number C-715310, and other data as captioned above.

Respectfully,

C. R. FORBES, Director.

Many Members of the House have had similar letters, and no doubt the above language is familiar to you all. I just want to suggest that if this tubercular condition existed at the date of the examination of this boy, it certainly existed for some months before that date, and it seems to me that the clause in the act might well be amended. I intend to offer an amendment to the act substituting the word "three" for the word "two," so that the limitation period may be three years instead of two years. Many men are shut out by 8 or 9 or 10 days, often due to the delay between the time of the application and the report on the examination, because of the long, winding, red-tape path that they have to follow before the first examination is made. I think on a day like this we might well dedicate ourselves to the further relief of these men who have lost the precious attribute of health in the service of their country. [Applause.]

Under the present laws governing payment of compensation to former disabled service men who contracted tuberculosis or mental diseases while in the military or naval service, or within two years following separation from the service, the administrative authorities of the United States Veterans' Bureau are compelled to accept the existence of such disabilities as proof of service origin thereof and pay adequate compensation to the disabled veteran.

It seems to me that the arbitrary period of two years is too short, and I do not believe that the members of the medical profession are justified in definitely deciding that such disabilities will necessarily develop within said two-year period. No one can state positively the exact period of time that must elapse before the effects of the various poisonous gases used during the World War show a marked increase in the number of neuropsychiatric and tubercular cases. In fact, it has already been brought out in hearings held before legislative committees that the peak of such development will not be reached within five years. Gentlemen, let me urge upon you the necessity for immediate action; in many cases this is a matter of life and death.

ELIGIBLE LISTS FOR POSTMASTERS.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter from the United States Civil Service Commission on the subject of certifying eligible lists for postmasterships.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting a letter from the Civil Service Commission relative to eligible lists for postmasters. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

UNITED STATES CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., February 20, 1922.

Hon. FREDERICK R. LEHLBACH,
Chairman Civil Service Reform Committee,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN LEHLBACH: It is probably not necessary for the commission to answer every erroneous statement with reference to civil service made by Congressmen and published in the RECORD, but in the speech of Congressman THOMAS, of Kentucky, published in the RECORD of Monday, January 23, 1922 (pp. 1595-1597), there are certain statements which perhaps should not go unanswered, and if you are of this opinion you are at liberty to have this letter inserted in the RECORD.

I quote from his speech the following:

"I have it on perfectly reliable authority, which authority will be produced if this Republican Congress will order an investigation of the actions of the Civil Service Commission and the Post Office Department under this Republican administration, that the private secretary to Dr. Work, a Mr. Johnston, I believe, his name is, stated to A. P. Richards, who is connected with the Civil Service Commission, that he was returning the eligible list for postmaster at a certain town, with the statement that he noticed a certain person was not on the eligible list; that such person is our friend and we would like to have him on the list, and see if you can not revise the list so as to include our friend."

"From the above statements it seems perfectly patent that there is a well-defined working agreement between the Civil Service Commission and the Post Office Department as to eligible lists for postmasters' appointments, or, rather, I believe the commission obeys the requests of the department as to the eligible lists, fearing if it does not do so the heads of its members will fall into the official waste basket of the Post Office Department."

The above is wholly unfounded. No one in the Post Office Department has ever to my knowledge undertaken even to suggest who should or who should not be on any eligible list. The Post Office Department has never made any such suggestions to the commission, and I am sure it would not do so. The lists are made up on evidence which the commission obtains in as far and thorough a manner as possible, and the eligibles are certified to the Post Office Department on their merits wholly. No such conversation as above referred to took place, as I am informed by Mr. Richards.

In the case of Edgar A. Simkins, referred to in the speech of Mr. THOMAS, the facts are that he was promoted, having been already under civil service; and, as you well know, promotion is one of the cardinal principles of civil service. It is true that Mr. Simkins was reinstated in the service before promotion, but it is also true that his absence was on "military leave" from August 8, 1916, and such absence should not militate against him. In case of promotions the Post Office Department sends to the Civil Service Commission its desire to promote, and in accordance with the Executive order the commission's duty is to see if the person so recommended possesses the minimum requirements for the office. This was done in a perfectly regular and legal manner.

The record of Mr. THOMAS's speech purports to quote from a letter which Dr. Work wrote to the Civil Service Commission on August 31, 1921. To show this I quote from the RECORD, as follows:

"In view of the experience of Mr. Simkins and the fact that he is strongly recommended locally for this position (by the Republican county committee, of course, of which Simkins was chairman), the department desires to nominate him for the position of postmaster."

Perhaps I do not know how to interpret this, but the ordinary reader would suppose that the language above used was intended to be quoted verbatim from Dr. Work's letter. Would he not? I have the letter before me for comparison, and I find that the language in parentheses in the RECORD, namely, "by the Republican county committee, of course, of which Simkins was chairman," was not in Dr. Work's letter at all. I presume it was inserted there by the speaker, but to the lay reader it would give the impression that Dr. Work was appealing to us on political grounds.

This was not true, as I have specifically shown in this case, and now I would like to say, generally, that it is not true and never has been true in any case.

In the case of the Bowling Green post office, a certification has been made to the Post Office Department and no review of the case is asked for.

In the case of Brownsville, Ky., referred to by Congressman THOMAS, the fact is that all three men certified by the commission to the Post Office Department were "ex-service men." I might add that the commission spares no pains to give ex-service men all that is permissible on their merits and then adds the 5-point bonus in accordance with the Executive order. The time they were in the service is also allowed as business experience in accordance with the Executive order.

It would seem to me in the interest of correcting erroneous statements in the RECORD that this letter might well be inserted.

By direction of the commission.

Very respectfully,

JOHN H. BARTLETT, President.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER. To-day is Calendar Wednesday. The Clerk will call the committees.

The Committee on the District of Columbia was called.

MARINE INSURANCE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I call up for further consideration the bill (S. 2265) to regulate marine insurance in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania calls up S. 2265. This bill is on the Union Calendar, and the House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. McARTHUR] will resume the chair.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of S. 2265, with Mr. McARTHUR in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will resume the reading of the bill for amendment under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

CHAPTER VI.—INVESTMENT OF ASSETS OF DOMESTIC COMPANIES.

SEC. 17. That the cash capital of every domestic corporation transacting marine insurance in the District, required to have a capital, to the extent of the minimum capital required by this act, shall be invested and kept invested in—

(1) Stocks or bonds of the United States, or of any State or of the District, or of any county, township, school, or other district or municipality in the United States, or Federal farm loan bonds, not estimated above their par value or their current market value.

(2) Bonds or notes secured by mortgages or deeds of trust of improved unencumbered real estate, or perpetual leases thereof, in the United States, worth not less than 50 per cent more than the amount loaned thereon. Where improvements on land constitute part of the value on which the loan is made, the improvements shall be insured against fire for the benefit of the mortgagee in amount not less than the difference between two-thirds the value of the land and the amount of the loan.

(3) Mortgage bonds of railroad companies in the United States and on which default in payment of interest has not occurred within five years prior to the purchase by the company.

(4) Loans upon the pledge of such securities.

The cash capital of every insurance corporation not organized under the laws of the District and transacting marine insurance in the District to the extent of the minimum capital required of a like domestic corporation shall be invested and kept invested in the same classes of securities specified in the preceding paragraph of this section for domestic insurance corporations, except that like securities of the home State or foreign country shall be recognized as legal investments for the amount of the minimum capital required. The residue of the capital and the surplus money and funds of every domestic insurance corporation over and above its capital, and the deposits that it may be required to make with the superintendent, may be invested in or loaned on the pledge of any of the securities specified in the preceding paragraph of this section; or in the stocks, bonds, or other evidence of indebtedness of any solvent institution incorporated under the laws of the United States, or of any State thereof, or of the District; or in such real estate as it is authorized by this act to hold.

The assets of every domestic mutual insurance corporation transacting marine insurance in the District to the extent of an amount equal to the minimum capital required of a like domestic stock corporation shall be invested and kept invested in the same class of securities specified for the investment of the minimum capital of like domestic stock insurance corporations. The residue of the assets of every domestic mutual insurance corporation, over and above said amount, may be invested in or loaned on the pledge of the same classes of securities or property as specified in this chapter for the investment or loan of the residue of the capital and the surplus money and funds of like domestic stock insurance corporations.

A company doing business in a foreign country may invest the funds required to meet its obligations in such country in conformity to the laws thereof in the same kinds of securities in such foreign country as such company is allowed by law to invest in the United States.

Nothing in this act shall prohibit a company from accepting in good faith, to protect its interests, securities or property, other than herein referred to, in payment of or to secure debts due or to become due the company.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. What is the idea of the final paragraph in this section? The first six or seven paragraphs of the section specify the securities in which their money must be invested and what property they may hold. Then you say that nothing in this act shall prohibit a company from accepting in good faith, to protect its interest, securities or properties, other than herein referred to; that is property which it is prohibited to accept and hold by the rest of the section.

Mr. EDMONDS. It is only in case of emergency.

Mr. WALSH. It does not say so.

Mr. EDMONDS. It says "to protect its interests."

Mr. WALSH. I know, but they hold all this property to protect their interests. That is why they hold all of the property which under the preceding paragraphs of the section they are permitted to hold.

Mr. EDMONDS. This paragraph should be taken in connection with the rest of the section. It is to cover an exceptional case, where a company finds that in order to protect itself it has to take outside assets. That has been done frequently, and it has been done in other States. Sometimes they have to go outside the regular channel in order to protect their stockholders. This seems to be fully understood by the insurance men, and the insurance commissioners seemed to think it was all right.

Mr. WALSH. The insurance commissioner now in office might think so, but by some good fortune or evil fortune there might be somebody in office later who would not understand it. If this is to take care of an emergency, or to protect the company from losses, I think it ought to be so stated. Otherwise the section amounts to this, that it says "We will specify what they can invest in and what property they may hold, but if they do not do that they can hold any other property to protect their interests."

Mr. EDMONDS. Would the gentleman suggest the use of the expression that nothing in this act shall prohibit a company in an emergency from accepting in good faith? Would that be satisfactory?

Mr. WALSH. In an emergency, or to protect it against losses, or something of that sort.

Mr. EDMONDS. I think "in an emergency" would be the proper words to use.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Unless you define "an emergency" that language does not mean anything.

Mr. WALSH. That is why I was suggesting that the emergency should be coupled up with something to indicate that it is to prevent losses. I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania sees the point.

Mr. EDMONDS. I see the point the gentleman is making.

Mr. WALSH. And while that may all be understood by the insurance commissioners now, if this bill becomes a law it leaves an opportunity for somebody later to misunderstand it.

Mr. EDMONDS. Would the gentleman be satisfied if we put after the word "company" the words "to prevent loss," so as to provide that—

Nothing in this act shall prohibit a company, in order to prevent loss, from accepting in good faith—

Would that be plain enough?

Mr. WALSH. I think those words ought to come in after the word "faith."

Mr. EDMONDS. Would the gentleman suggest the words "in order to prevent loss"?

Mr. WALSH. Some such language as that—to prevent losses.

Mr. EDMONDS. I move an amendment after the word "faith" in line 14, to insert the words "in order to prevent losses," and a comma after that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. EDMONDS: Page 24, line 14, after the word "faith" insert the words "in order to prevent losses."

Mr. EDMONDS. The word "and" should follow the word "losses."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. EDMONDS: Page 24, line 14, after the word "faith" insert the words "in order to prevent losses and."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I should like to have the gentleman give me an illustration of an occurrence such as is described in this paragraph which is to be amended.

Mr. EDMONDS. It might be possible that the company had taken some bonds on a 50 per cent basis and yet the loss might be so great that they required additional security which the party could not give them except in securities they could not accept. In that case they would be able to take something to protect the stockholders.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. If this is intended to give an additional security after the transaction is over—

Mr. EDMONDS. It is intended to give additional security and protection.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. It says they may take security on property to secure debts due the company.

Mr. EDMONDS. This would only be possible in event that the loan was one where they had not sufficient security, or the security became bad and they had to take additional security to protect the loan. It might be possible that the man could not give security that they could take. The restrictions are sharply drawn. They can not hold but a certain amount of real estate. The result might be that a man would say I will give you my house as security, and they could not take it. The paragraph is only intended to protect them in an emergency that might arise.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I think the paragraph is broader than the gentleman thinks it will accomplish.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 18. That a domestic company may acquire, hold, and convey real estate for the purpose and in the manner only following:

(1) The building in which it has its principal office and the land on which it stands.

(2) Such as shall be requisite for branch office or other business facilities necessary for its convenient accommodation in the transaction of its business.

(3) Such as shall have been acquired for the accommodation of its business.

(4) Such as shall have been mortgaged to it in good faith by way of security for loans previously contracted or for money due.

(5) Such as shall have been conveyed to it in satisfaction of debts previously contracted in the course of its dealings.

(6) Such as it shall have purchased at sales on judgments, decrees, or mortgages obtained or made for such debts.

All such real estate specified in subdivisions (3), (4), (5), and (6) of this section which shall not be necessary for its accommodation in the convenient transaction of its business shall be sold by the company and disposed of within five years after it shall have acquired the title to the same, or within five years after the same shall have ceased to be necessary for the accommodation of its business, unless the company procure the certificate of the superintendent that its interests will suffer materially by a forced sale thereof, in which event the time for the sale may be extended to such time as the superintendent shall direct in such certificate.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment which I think will correct a rather clumsy language. I think the word "only" should follow the word "estate" in line 18, and the word "only" in line 19 should be stricken out, so that it will read "that a domestic company may acquire, hold, and convey real estate only for the purpose and in the manner following."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 24, line 18, after the word "estate," insert the word "only," and in line 19, at the beginning of the line, strike out the word "only."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 19. That any two or more corporations organized under the laws of the District and transacting the business of marine insurance may merge or consolidate into one corporation under the name of any title approved by the superintendent, but no mutual corporation or company shall be merged with a stock corporation or company. With the approval of the superintendent, a corporation organized within the District and transacting marine insurance may also be merged or consolidated with any marine insurance company or companies organized under the law of any State or States of the United States, into one corporation. In either case the corporations may enter into and make an agreement for such merger or consolidation, prescribing its terms and conditions, the amount of its capital, which shall not be larger in amount than the aggregate amount of capital of the merged or consolidated corporations, and the number of shares into which it is to be divided. Such agreement must be assented to by a vote of the majority of the number of directors of each corporation prescribed in its charter and must be approved by the votes of stockholders owning at least two-thirds of the stock of each corporation represented and voted upon in person or by proxy at a meeting, called separately for that purpose upon a notice stating the time, place, and object of the meeting, served at least 30 days previously upon each personally or mailed to him at his last known post-office address, and also published at least once a week for four weeks successively in some newspaper printed in the District, and in case any of the merging companies are domiciled in some other State or States at least once a week for four weeks in some newspaper printed in the town or county where each such company has its principal office. Every such agreement must have the approval of the superintendent before the details of said agreement may be carried into effect as provided therein.

The new corporation may require the return of the original certificates of stock held by each stockholder in each of the corporations to be merged or consolidated and issue in lieu thereof new certificates for such number of shares of its own stock as such stockholder may be entitled to receive. Upon such merger or consolidation all rights and property of the several companies shall become the property of the corporation composed of such companies, and the new corporation shall succeed to all the obligations and liabilities of the old corporations in the same manner as if they had been incurred or contracted by it. The stockholders of the old corporations shall continue subject to all the liabilities, claims, and demands existing against them at or before such merger or consolidation. No action or proceeding pending at the time of the consolidation in which any or all of the old corporations may be a party shall abate or discontinue by reason of the merger or consolidation, but the same may be prosecuted to final judgment in the same manner as if the merger or consolidation had not taken place, or the new corporation may be substituted in place of any corporation so merged or consolidated by order of the court in which the action or proceeding may be pending.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I notice that this is a very important chapter and section in the bill, I think the most important. It permits a merger or consolidation of any corporation organized in the District with corporations that are organized in Pennsylvania or with corporations that may have been organized in half a dozen States, so that in the District there will be one corporation.

Now, I would like some explanation from the gentleman from Pennsylvania as to why we give this broad invitation, apparently, for companies to consolidate, and even go so far that if they wish, to create and establish a monopoly not only in the marine business but of other kinds of business, including reinsurance.

Mr. EDMONDS. I will explain, and probably it may be sufficient to satisfy the gentleman. In the first place, this requires the companies outside the District to have the consent and the certificate of the superintendent before doing business in the District. Further than that, it requires a compliance with the laws of the State under which the company was organized and the winding up and a cleaning up of the assets.

This is what we found and I think there is a good deal of force in the contention that they should be allowed to merge. We found a group of insurance companies in New Jersey, in New York, and Connecticut, whose capital stock was virtually controlled by a holding company organized under the laws of New Jersey. In other words, while operating individually in Connecticut, in New York, in New Jersey, a holding company in one case had five companies under one holding. That all adds to the cost of insurance and it seems like a foolish method when by the consolidation we can thereby effect an economy. The committee felt that it would tend to economy, and it is limited to marine insurance. If it is necessary to have a holding company to save overhead expenses, to carry out a consolidation which does not appear on the surface, why not have it done open and aboveboard and save the premium money that otherwise would be paid?

Mr. WALSH. The argument in favor of a holding company is one of economy.

They will tell you that instead of having a half dozen corporations operating and conducting their business, going out after business in the same territory, they will form a holding company, with one overhead organization to supervise all of the rest of the organizations, and thereby they will eliminate the overhead.

Mr. EDMONDS. Unfortunately that is not true in the insurance business. The gentleman can readily see that the organization in Connecticut, we will say, must be kept up the same as it was before, and that the organization must be kept up in New York the same as before, and in New Jersey or Pennsylvania, or any other State. The result is that the holding company is simply a company holding the stocks of these companies, owning property there, and operating under united management. There can be no breakdown of your State insurance laws, because every State prescribes how a company can wind up its business. Therefore, if a company in New York were coming down into the District of Columbia, to join with a company here, it would be forced to wipe out its business in New York before it could do so, and if the superintendent in New York did not want to give his consent, they could not do it.

Mr. WALSH. But it is not necessary that they wind up their business. They can form a lot of new corporations to-day, and to-morrow they can come down to the superintendent in Washington and say that they want to merge with the George Washington Insurance Co. of the District of Columbia, that they have not established any business, that they are incorporated under the laws of Connecticut or New Jersey, or Delaware or Massachusetts, or Pennsylvania or Illinois, that they have complied with all of their provisions, that they have issued their stock and that they desire to incorporate. There is nothing, as I understand it, that will prevent a parent company from still continuing business in one of these other States even though one of its subsidiaries is in this merger.

Mr. EDMONDS. If you were to strike it out of the bill, there would be nothing to prevent a holding corporation under the present corporation laws of the District of Columbia from holding stock in a dozen insurance companies. Why not do aboveboard what you are doing below board? That was the reason for it. It is not a matter of vital importance to the bill. Personally, if the Members here think it ought to be stricken out, I am willing to strike it out. It is simply a matter of policy that we have to decide upon. Do we want to have a holding company with four or five different companies that have gotten together, virtually operating together, virtually a monopoly, if you wish, operate in this manner? They have to have a different corporation in each State in order to operate under the insurance laws.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I was going to ask of what advantage it would be to us to provide for the organization of a company here in the District and provide safeguards about its investments, and so forth, and give it blanket authority to consolidate with any outside corporations?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Of what advantage is it, I say, to safeguard it here, and then given the corporation blanket authority to consolidate with any outside corporations or any number of outside corporations, and say that when that consolidation shall have been perfected that this corporation that we have organized shall be subject to all of the liabilities of these other corporations? Of what advantage is our safeguarding the interests of the corporation in this organization if we are to subject it to all of the liabilities and all of the obligations of these other companies when this consolidation, under the provisions of this section, could be made without reference to what sort of obligations these other companies have? Of course, there is an arbitrary provision that the superintendent must approve the consolidation. I do not think it is a very wise thing to put into the hands of any one man the approval or disapproval of such an important matter and have no basis whatever for his judgment, but to just leave it to the arbitrary will of the superintendent.

Mr. WALSH. It might well be that in a particular line of insurance it would be a most unwise thing to have any consolidation.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is vital to the bill, and I am willing to strike it out—that is, to strike out the clause that is connected with the merging of companies outside of the District with one in the District. It is not vital at all. If the gentleman thinks from my explanation that it ought to be kept in the bill, I am perfectly willing to have it stay in the bill.

Mr. WALSH. I do not think at the start of this new venture, and it is a new venture, that we ought to invite this. If they find it is necessary, after these companies have been conducting their business for a time, that this power should be given and that the concerns here in the District by consolidating can not carry on business or compete, and that it is better that they shall be permitted to merge with some company, for instance, in Arkansas or Arizona, two great insurance States, we can have a special act amending this bill.

Mr. EDMONDS. But I might not be here then to put it through.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, if the gentleman gets this measure through there will be no doubt about his being here. I think the language permitting this consolidation outside of the District should be eliminated, and I move to strike it out by offering the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 26, line 7, strike out the language, beginning with the word "with" down to and including the word "case" in line 13, capitalize the letter "t" in the word "the," and on page 27, line 5, beginning with the word "and," after the word "district," strike out all of the language down to and including the word "office" in line 8.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 21. That corporations engaged exclusively in the writing of insurance in foreign countries may be organized within the District in the same manner and under the same conditions as prescribed by this act for companies writing risks within the United States. The capital stock of such insurance corporations may be owned by American corporations engaged in the same kind of insurance, and the holding companies shall be given credit for the stock thus owned as admitted assets when rendering their financial statements to the superintendent. Any corporation organized under this section shall pay taxes and fees as provided under Chapter V of this act and shall comply with and receive the benefit of all other sections of this act so far as the same may be applicable.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I notice in this foreign business of these insurance companies it is provided that they shall pay taxes and fees as provided under chapter 5 of this act, and turning back to chapter 5 it will be seen the language there is so worded as to exempt them from all taxes on their foreign business, or practically all their taxes. In other words, outside of certain domestic taxes, set out in section 8, page 12, the company shall only pay taxes on a certain percentage of the business done in the District of Columbia.

Mr. EDMONDS. I do not think that the gentleman quite understands this paragraph.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I have read it very carefully.

Mr. EDMONDS. As the matter stands now this paragraph allows 10, 12, or 15 insurance companies to get together in a corporation which will be a separate corporation.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I know, but this goes ahead and specifically states that they shall pay taxes and fees as provided under chapter 5 of the act. Now, chapter 5 of this act limits the taxes to a certain proportion of the business done within the District of Columbia, so that would exempt them from paying all taxes on all business done without the District of Columbia and in foreign countries.

Mr. EDMONDS. The gentleman is wrong there.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I do not think so.

Mr. EDMONDS. Where did the gentleman say it was?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Page 12, that with the exception of certain designated taxes "the companies organized under this act shall pay taxes on that proportion of the total underwriting profit of the company for marine insurance written within the United States which the net premiums of the company from marine insurance written within the District bear to the total net marine premiums written within the United States. That is at the bottom of page 12 and runs over on page 13. The paragraph under discussion says that these companies which organize to do foreign business shall pay taxes in the manner set out in chapter 5. Turning back to chapter 5 we find the tax is limited to a certain proportion of the business done within the District of Columbia. In other words, these companies so organized to do foreign business shall be exempt from all taxation except certain designated fees and taxes named in section 8, so that they will not be liable to taxes other than those that are imposed upon these corporations organized under this act to do business within the District of Columbia on the business written within the District. In fact, by the terms written into the paragraph we have under consideration all of these companies—and they are practically unlimited in the line of business they can engage in—will be exempt from taxation on all business done in foreign countries, and by means of this exemption they would be able to drive out of competition any company organized under the laws of any State in this Union which undertook to do any foreign business whatever.

Mr. EDMONDS. No; the gentleman is mistaken there.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I would be very glad to be shown I am mistaken; I do not believe I am.

Mr. EDMONDS. If the gentleman will read here, he will find this language:

That any domestic company authorized to write insurance or reinsurance within the District may establish and maintain one or more agencies beyond the United States for the transaction of its lawful business—

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. EDMONDS. Now, this is the present condition of affairs: If a company is formed in Spain, it does not pay taxes in the District of Columbia.

Mr. JONES of Texas. That is very true; but it does pay taxes in Spain.

Mr. EDMONDS. Why should it pay taxes here when its business is done there?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I am talking about companies organized in the District of Columbia as compared with companies doing business under the laws of the various States.

Mr. EDMONDS. New York laws accept this; they passed this last year; and Pennsylvania, I understand, has also; and other States are going to accept it.

Mr. JONES of Texas. The gentleman does not mean that the people of Pennsylvania and New York are going to or have agreed that the United States Government shall exempt from all taxes insurance companies doing business within the District?

Mr. EDMONDS. No; because in the District of Columbia they pay. Every one of these corporations is taxed in the District of Columbia, and they will pay.

Mr. JONES of Texas. But they will not pay on the income and net returns from foreign business.

Mr. EDMONDS. That is exactly true, and exactly what we are trying to do in the bill, to prevent their paying on the foreign business.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Under the provision you have written in this section they would not pay any tax whatever on anything from their foreign business, no matter how much they may accumulate in this country therefrom.

Mr. EDMONDS. Certainly they would not pay any tax on the foreign business.

Mr. JONES of Texas. The various State laws require the payment of taxes on business.

Mr. EDMONDS. On business written in foreign countries?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. EDMONDS. Certainly not.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Not on business, but on property rights acquired or business done and property rights accumulated from business done in foreign countries they are compelled to pay, and they are compelled to pay taxes on their net income under Federal law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I think it will accomplish the purpose I have under consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES of Texas: On page 29, line 15, after the word "shall," strike out the remainder of line 15 and line 16 down to and including the word "shall."

Mr. JONES of Texas. That amendment would leave all the paragraphs of this bill which are applicable to these companies still applicable, and at the same time would save them from having an exemption that other companies would not have.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. What tax does the gentleman have in mind? The Federal income tax?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I am speaking of the general revenue laws of the United States.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The Federal income tax?

Mr. JONES of Texas. The other companies must pay their taxes under the general revenues of this country. You are writing into a bill, as it is worded here, a provision which would exempt the companies in the District of Columbia from being liable to payment of taxes under the general revenue laws of the United States, which would give them a distinct advantage.

Mr. EDMONDS. It does not.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Oh, yes; it does. If you read the provision here in connection with the provision concerning exemption, on pages 12 and 13, you will see that that is the case very clearly, because this section that we have under consideration provides for doing business in foreign countries. Then it lays alongside of that provision a stipulation that the companies so engaged in business shall be taxed according to the provisions of section 8. Now, section 8 of chapter 5 says that such companies shall pay taxes only on a certain proportion of the business which they write within the District of Columbia. When you write that provision into the law, you exempt them from all of the Federal revenue laws, except these two or three exceptions that are written in the first part of chapter 5.

Mr. EDMONDS. The gentleman is an attorney, and I would like to ask him a question. Do you mean to say a company organized under the District of Columbia, as far as its Federal taxes are concerned, would be in a different position than a company organized, say, under the State of Maryland?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I certainly do. A company organized under the laws of the State of Maryland, unless the law specifically exempted it, would be compelled to pay taxes on its foreign business.

Mr. EDMONDS. Most of the taxes in this bill are local taxes, and there is absolutely nothing in the bill that the gentleman can show me that in any way exempts them from paying any Federal taxes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. It says here in chapter 5, which is the only one that according to this bill shall govern, that with the exceptions of license fees and two or three other taxes mentioned, these companies shall pay no other taxes than that proportion of the total underwriting profit of the company being written within the United States and within the District of Columbia. In other words, it leaves these companies out of the scope and purview of the general revenue laws of the United States, and those laws continue to be applicable to companies which are organized under the laws of the various States of the Union.

Mr. EDMONDS. I want to say to the gentleman that he is entirely mistaken in that, because there is absolutely no intention on the part of anybody to prevent it. If they had a 1 per cent revenue tax, they would have to pay it.

Mr. JONES of Texas. That may be what you intended, but that is not what you say.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. LEHLBACH. The taxes in section 8 are the taxes which are levied in the District of Columbia, treating it as a local governmental organization, which would be levied by a State were these companies incorporated under the laws of a State.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I think so.

Mr. LEHLBACH. And the gentleman, whenever he quotes that phrase in section 8 which begins with "shall be taxed only on that proportion of the total underwriting profit," omits the phrase which immediately precedes it.

Mr. JONES of Texas. No.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Which is this, that the company's license to transact business within the District shall, with respect to marine insurance written by it within the District, be taxed only so-and-so. Now, that means the tax which a State locally would levy, and which is provided for in this bill as a local government expense, and does not exempt the companies organized under this from any general Federal provisions whatever.

Mr. JONES of Texas. But you go further and state over here that those taxes shall not apply; that those taxes only shall apply to foreign business. Inasmuch as foreign business will, of course, not be transacted in the District of Columbia, there would be practically no taxes. At least, that will furnish a basis of contention for all companies so organized.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLANTON. In answer to the gentleman's question, the chairman frankly told him that it was his purpose and the purpose of the committee to free these companies that are to do business under this act from all taxes on their income from foreign business. He has been very frank with the gentleman in admitting that. I wanted to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that that is another of the little inside advantages that these special companies are to enjoy over all the rest of the companies that do business in the United States.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Very clearly that is the way it seems to me. And the gentleman took the position that they should not pay these taxes. Now, if the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] is correct, there can be no harm in adopting my amendment, which would leave these companies subject to the general revenue laws of the United States just the same. But no; you do not want that amendment. Now, the gentleman's construction would apply clearly if we leave out the clause which was written in paragraph 21, and which my amendment seeks to eliminate. In other words, I think these laws should be applied uniformly. If a company wants to do business in Texas or New York or in any other State, they should be permitted to do so on the same dead level of equality. Here you undertake to exempt corporations doing business in the District from certain taxes. In another place authority is given to corporations in other States to merge with those in the District. It is a powerful means of coercion. I am glad the House has adopted the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], which eliminates the latter provision. Otherwise companies in other States would practically have been forced into the District. When you put in paragraph 21 "that any corporation organized to do business in foreign countries shall pay taxes as provided under section 5 of this act" you grant practically a total exemption as to the payment of taxes. If you enact that into the law you will drive every other company organized under any other State of this Union which does business in foreign countries out of business in those foreign countries or into dissolving and reorganizing within the District.

Mr. EDMONDS. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. EDMONDS. What I want to say is this: If a company in New York has an agent in Spain and writes its business in Spain, it is not taxed in New York State. If a company in the District of Columbia goes over to Spain and does business in Spain, it would not be expected to be taxed for that business in the District of Columbia.

There is nothing in this bill in any shape or form that prevents the payment of Federal taxes. Whatever this Congress sees fit to tax these companies they will have to pay, not as a local matter but as a revenue matter.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Of course they would have to pay if you did not write in the body of the law a statement that they are exempt from the taxes. If you enact a law and then come along later and say that a certain company doing business in a certain place is not subject to the law, by inference you repeal the general law in so far as it applies to such company.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I yield.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. As I understand it, the gentleman is talking about Federal income taxes?

Mr. JONES of Texas. The general revenue laws of the United States.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Excess-profit taxes, of course.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Well, it might be, so far as this year is concerned, income and all other Federal taxes.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. What about our "return to normalcy"?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Oh, that would be more than "normalcy" for these favored companies, and less than "normalcy" for all others.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Certain taxes laid on incomes of corporations.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I would not want to undertake at the moment to analyze and state what ones would apply. But this would exempt these companies from all taxes, so far as the income and net returns from foreign business is concerned. I do not think they should be so exempted, because if a corporation is organized in my own State or in any other State they ought to be allowed to do business on the same basis, with the same rights and privileges, as a corporation organized under the laws of the District of Columbia.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. What I want to get at is, what the gentleman thinks this corporation will be exempted from?

Mr. JONES of Texas. It will be exempt from the general provisions of the revenue laws of the United States which apply to all other corporations doing business of this kind.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey is recognized in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, section 21 of this bill, to which the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] is offered, provides that corporations engaged exclusively in writing insurance in foreign countries may be organized in the District under the same provisions under which domestic companies may be organized. It says that such foreign writing insurance companies may have their stock held wholly or in part by American corporations engaged in the same kind of insurance, and then it provides further, "Any corporation organized under this section shall pay taxes and fees as provided under chapter 5 of this act and shall comply with and receive the benefit of all other sections of this act so far as the same may be applicable."

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. If the gentleman from Texas will allow me to follow out the train of thought that I have in mind, I would prefer to do that. I do not want my train of thought to be broken.

Now, what are those taxes and fees provided under section 5? They are the local taxes in the District of Columbia, taxes payable on property locally taxable. They are taxes on the local property of the corporation, and they are taxed on that portion of the business done within the District of Columbia as that business compares with the business done in the United States generally. Now, these companies organized exclusively to do business in foreign countries will have no business in the District of Columbia, and therefore they will have no such tax levied on them. They will pay tax on their real estate and on their personal property locally under this chapter 5.

Now, there is nothing in section 21 which makes the payment of those taxes exclusive and limits the payment of other taxes.

It says they shall pay the same taxes as other companies organized in the District under chapter 5, and there is nothing in chapter 5 or in chapter 21 here which relieves these corporations, or the domestic corporations, or any other corporations doing insurance, either domestic or foreign, organized under this bill, from the general revenue laws of the country at all.

Mr. JONES of Texas. The gentleman is familiar with the principle of law that by enumerating certain things you exclude those not enumerated?

Mr. LEHLBACH. The gentleman is not familiar with a principle of law which says that if certain corporations must pay certain specific local taxes, that by construction relieves them of paying general taxes. There is no such general principle of law with which the gentleman from New Jersey is familiar.

Mr. JONES of Texas. This provision in section 21 says, "Any corporation organized under this section shall pay taxes and fees as provided under chapter 5 of this act."

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Does not that undertake to state what taxes they shall pay?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Certainly; taxes on their real estate and personal property.

Mr. JONES of Texas. And, in other words, they shall pay no other taxes than those named.

Mr. LEHLBACH. No; it does not say that at all. The gentleman would attempt to read into that section the word "only." He would make it read, "Any corporation organized under this bill shall pay taxes as provided under chapter 5, and no other taxes." These words are not there, either expressly or impliedly.

Mr. JONES of Texas. They are in the other section, to wit, section 8, and it expressly says that the other section shall apply.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division. This is an important amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas demands a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 14, noes 22.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 24. That any person or corporation holding such license from the superintendent who shall do or perform any or all of the aforesaid acts in connection with marine insurance with any corporation, person, partnership, association, Lloyd's, individual underwriters, or interinsurers, which are not authorized by license of the superintendent to transact such business in the District, shall (1) maintain in good faith an office in the District, (2) keep in said office a complete book of record of the marine insurance transacted by, through, or with his or its assistance with unauthorized insurers, showing (a) a brief description or identification of the subject matter and kind of the insurance, (b) the voyage insured, or, if for time, the date of such insurance going into effect and the date of its termination, (c) the name of the beneficial insured, (d) the amount insured with unauthorized insurers, (e) the rate of premium, (f) the gross premium payable therefor. Such book of record shall also contain statements in the same details of all such insurances canceled or on which premiums have been increased or reduced (including laying-up returns) and the amounts of additional or of return premiums thereon; (3) keep in said office such additional record of the insurance, including the names of the corporations, partnerships, associations, persons, Lloyd's, underwriters, of interinsurers and the amount insured by each. The books of record and all supplementing records shall be open at all times to the inspection of and examination by the superintendent of insurance or anyone appointed by him for said purpose. The data as herein outlined shall be furnished to the superintendent within one month following his request therefor and upon the form furnished by him. Such classified records of any licensee reporting shall be regarded by the superintendent as intended solely for the information of the District and Federal Governments and shall not be revealed to any person not authorized by law to receive the same. Any person or persons in position to acquire the aforesaid information who shall, either while in office or after leaving office, reveal such information to any person or corporation not legally authorized to receive the same shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and subject, upon conviction, to a fine of $2,000 or imprisonment for one year, or to both such fine and imprisonment. Any licensee under this chapter failing to report such classified records within the time limit prescribed by this section shall forfeit to the District $200 per month for each month he has failed.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I realize that it is somewhat presumptuous for a Member who has just come in on the floor to attempt to discuss a bill of this character; but I must confess that on looking this bill over it appears to me as if a whole regiment of Africans are concealed in this woodpile that is before the House. I am at a loss to understand how it is that these companies are permitted not only to insure anything that is carried by a ship but anything that is carried by an automobile as well. The bill purports to be a bill for marine insurance, but an examination of it shows that under it companies may be formed to carry on any kind of insurance. I am at a loss to understand this tax provision, and I should like to inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS] if this bill is intended to cover much the same provision with reference to taxation of insurance companies that was at one time before the Ways and Means Committee, the purpose of which was to exempt marine insurance companies from certain taxes?

Mr. EDMONDS. This bill has nothing whatever to do with Federal taxes. Whatever Federal taxes may be assessed against insurance companies will be assessed against these companies organized in the District of Columbia just the same as against any other companies organized anywhere else.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I wish I was as well satisfied on that point as the gentleman seems to be.

Mr. EDMONDS. I am perfectly well satisfied, because that matter was taken up and carefully considered by the committee. Insurance companies are incorporated in the District of Columbia just the same as they are incorporated in the gentleman's State of Iowa, and just the same as they are incorporated in the State of New York. A company organized in the District of Columbia comes under any Federal law that may be passed relating to insurance companies, just the same as an insurance company organized under the laws of any State, and the taxes provided for in this bill are taxes to be imposed by the government of the District of Columbia for the purpose of paying the expenses of carrying on the office of commissioner of insurance in the District of Columbia and other necessary expenses. The purpose of this bill is to provide for the incorporation of marine insurance companies in the District of Columbia. There is an incorporation law in the District of Columbia to-day providing for the incorporation of companies to engage in other branches of the insurance business. There is nothing in this bill changing the law with reference to Federal taxes. These companies pay Federal taxes now and they will pay them after this bill passes. It appears difficult to draw the line in the minds of the Members between the incorporation of a local company in the District of Columbia and the incorporation of a Federal company, but this bill does not relate to the incorporation of a Federal company, but relates solely to the incorporation of companies under the laws of the District of Columbia.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the gentleman will permit me, I will say that it would not be at all difficult to draw the line if only it had been drawn in this bill. It may be that the imaginary line that the gentleman speaks of can be traced by a careful reading of the provisions of this bill, and I confess that I have not gone over the legal features of the bill carefully enough to say that the gentleman is not correct; but it would have been perfectly easy to fix this so that there would be no doubt about it.

Mr. EDMONDS. There is no doubt about it. It never entered the minds of the members of the committee, and it never entered the minds of the experts who assisted the committee, that they were doing anything more than a town council would do for a city or than a State legislature would do for a State.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I know there have been cases in which gentlemen supposed they were doing that, but subsequently they found that they had done a good deal more than they intended to do.

Mr. EDMONDS. The gentleman knows just as well as I do that if the Ways and Means Committee draw a tax bill providing for the Federal taxation of insurance companies in all the States the companies in the District of Columbia will be included in that bill. It will be subsequent legislation anyhow. Supposing you pass a tax bill next year in which you tax insurance companies. The insurance companies in the District of Columbia must be taxed, of necessity, the same as any other insurance companies.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. We do not pass tax bills in that way.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Suppose that what the gentleman suggests should happen. These insurance companies organized under this bill would come in and say, "We organized under a law in which you exempted us from certain taxes on our incomes on foreign business. Now, when you have passed a law so exempting us and we have come in here and organized and have begun doing business, is it fair for you to make us pay taxes from which we have been exempted?" That is the way they will answer the proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. In view of the fact that other gentlemen have occupied most of my time I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that his time be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, as I stated, I am not prepared to say positively that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is not correct; but I am surprised that the bill is not brought in here in such form that a person can determine at a glance that he is correct in his statement that this will not interfere with the levying of Federal taxes. The sweeping provision with which the bill begins, including so many different kinds of insurance, rather leads me to distrust the experts who helped the gentleman prepare this bill. I do not doubt their cleverness. That is shown by the manner in which they have concealed the real purposes of the bill. They were evidently able enough, but I should prefer to have the advice of the Solicitor of the Treasury as to whether this would or would not exempt these insurance companies from Federal taxation, and I very much fear we are creating an insurance monopoly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I notice that according to sections 25 and 26, which have just been read, all corporations are required to take out a license and put up a bond. On page 31, under the first proviso, this superintendent is given the right to require a corporation organized under the laws of any State to take out a license and put up a bond with the superintendent. Does the gentleman mean corporations organized anywhere in the 48 States shall submit their right to do business to this superintendent?

Mr. EDMONDS. This provision is contained in every State law; your State has it, and my State has it.

Mr. JONES of Texas. The corporation has of course to comply with the State law, but you put in the further requirement that State corporations in addition thereto must come in and submit to further restrictions under the law which you insist is alone to apply to the District of Columbia. In other words, all the privileges you extend you extend only to corporations in the District, but when you come to put on restrictions and penalties you make them apply to all corporations organized in the different States.

Mr. EDMONDS. There is no State which does not require an outside company to submit to the superintendent and get a license before they can come in to do business.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Most assuredly, but they have to go further here and secure a license of this superintendent.

Mr. EDMONDS. Certainly; a corporation can not do business without complying with the State law.

Mr. JONES of Texas. On page 31 of the bill the first proviso reads:

Provided, That with respect to insurers organized under the laws of any foreign country and duly licensed to transact the business of insurance in any State or Territory of the United States and with respect to insurers organized under the laws of any State or Territory of the United States, said license shall not issue unless the superintendent shall be satisfied.

And so forth.

They must satisfy the superintendent of insurance of the District of Columbia, and he has the right to require penal bonds from them under the provisions set out here; and there are a number of other restrictions which have been named in sections 25 and 26, and at the same time none of the benefits of the various tax exemptions, and so forth, which are provided in the bill, inures to the benefit of the corporations organized under the laws of the various States.

Mr. EDMONDS. None of the benefits, of course—if they want to come in and establish themselves here—

Mr. JONES of Texas. That is it, you force every one of them to come here, you drive them out of business in the various States by giving them exemptions and benefits that you do not allow those not in the District of Columbia.

Mr. EDMONDS. As I have said, this is a provision that is in every State law in the country. No company outside of the State can come into the State and do business without getting a license from the superintendent.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Why do you require them to come here?

Mr. EDMONDS. We do not require them to come here; they can come here if they want to, but they do not have to come here.

Mr. JONES of Texas. But even if they do not come here to do business they have to get a license—

Mr. EDMONDS. Oh, no.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Under the provisions on page 31, if the superintendent requires it, before they can do business they must get this license.

Mr. EDMONDS. This has nothing to do with foreign companies.

Mr. JONES of Texas. It would apply not only to foreign companies, but the companies doing business here.

Mr. EDMONDS. This is a provision that is in every State law in the Union. If you have an insurance company in Texas you can not go into Pennsylvania unless you have satisfied the superintendent or the insurance commissioner.

Mr. JONES of Texas. You require the companies in the various States to get a license and do everything that is required, and then you place alongside of that tax exemptions for District of Columbia corporations which do not apply to other companies unless they come to the District of Columbia.

Mr. EDMONDS. If a company in the District of Columbia wants to do business in the State of Texas it has to comply with the laws of the State of Texas.

Mr. JONES of Texas. If a corporation in the District of Columbia wants to do a foreign business it does not have to comply with the laws of the different States, whereas if a State corporation wants to do business, it must comply with the laws of the State—

Mr. EDMONDS. If a company organized under the laws of New York wants to do business in the State of Texas it has to comply with the laws of the State of Texas.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I yield.

Mr. STEVENSON. I understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania to say, in reply to a question by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN], that if there were exemptions contained in the bill as to Federal taxation, if a bill was passed next year taxing all insurance companies, that would probably require them to pay a tax. I do not know whether there is an exemption here or not, but I want to direct attention to the fact that if a company comes in here and incorporates under a charter that exempts them from taxation and the charter does not provide for amendment or a repeal, that contract could not be impaired by subsequent legislation.

Mr. EDMONDS. There is nothing in this bill that prevents Federal taxation.

Mr. STEVENSON. I hope very much there is not, because there is nothing in the bill which prevents that from becoming an irrevocable contract. You have not put any provision in here which provides for the subsequent repeal or modification or amendment of this act.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. TINCHER. As I understand the gentleman's position it is that if a corporation obtains a charter under a law that exempts a corporation from taxation no subsequent legislative body could impose taxes on that corporation.

Mr. STEVENSON. That depends on when and where. In the District of Columbia a charter that is passed, with an exemption from taxation which is accepted and under which the corporation is organized can not subsequently be impaired by imposing taxes unless the charter itself has a provision in it that it is subject to amendment hereafter by Congress, because there is nothing in the Constitution that prohibits that thing.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Does the gentleman know of a jurisdiction within the Union which, since the Dartmouth College decision, does not provide in its basic law that charters are not unamendable contracts?

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not know of any, except the Congress of the United States, and there is nothing in the Constitution of the United States which safeguards that. Therefore when Congress passes a charter for a corporation in the District of Columbia it must provide for subsequent amendment, or it becomes an irrevocable contract.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

CHAPTER XII.—CLERICAL ASSISTANCE AND DEPARTMENTAL EXPENSES.

SEC. 29. For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act the superintendent of insurance is authorized to appoint, in addition to the present force, an examiner at $3,000 per annum, a clerk-stenographer at $1,800 per annum, and to increase the contingent expenses of the Insurance Department in the sum of $800.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SANDERS of Indiana: Page 36, line 21, after the figures "800," add a new section as follows:

"Nothing herein shall be construed so as to relieve any corporation organized under the provisions hereof from the payment of taxes on its income under the revenue laws of the United States."

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer that for the purpose of clarifying and making sure that the provisions of the act mean what the author of the bill contends they mean, and to meet the point made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES]. One of these sections deals with taxes. I think it was not meant to deal with Federal income taxes. Another provision refers to it, but it is left somewhat ambiguous.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Does the gentleman so word his amendment as to apply it to these companies which do business both foreign and domestic?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Any corporation organized under this act.

Mr. EDMONDS. Where does that come in?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. As a new section.

Mr. EDMONDS. And that will make a new chapter. Mr. Chairman, let us have the amendment again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the Sanders amendment.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman from Indiana that he should insert the words, "or doing business" after the word "organized," in his amendment. Some corporations might already have been organized. I think the amendment should read "any corporation organized or doing business under the provision of this act."

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The tax sections deal only with corporations organized. Certainly there is nothing that would indicate that a corporation not organized here would not pay taxes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I have in mind the provision about the merging of corporations here with outside corporations as well as corporations heretofore organized and which undertake to qualify under this law.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The bill authorizes only the merger of two corporations organized within the District. The language permitting a merger of outside corporations with District corporations was stricken out.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment by inserting after the word "organized" the words "or doing business."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES of Texas: Amend the amendment by inserting after the word "organized" the words "or doing business."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Indiana permit me to ask him a question? In line 18, on page 3, there is a provision that a marine, fire-marine, or fire insurance company "may be formed, admitted, or licensed." Should not the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana be so worded as to include not only those organized but those formed, admitted, or licensed?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. My purpose was to clarify what I thought might be an ambiguity in the two sections and to make it clear that we were not relieving them from Federal income taxes.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will not the gentleman ask unanimous consent to return to Chapter V on page 12 of the bill, which deals with taxes, and offer his amendment there at the end of that chapter, on page 21, to follow section 16 as section 17? It would then be in its proper order.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to Chapter V on page 12, and that the amendment which I have offered be offered at the end of page 21 as a new section, to be numbered 17.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the amendment which he has offered at the Clerk's desk, with the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES], be considered as an amendment to Chapter V, to be offered at the bottom of page 21 as section 17. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, just this word in reference to the amendment which I have offered. On page 31 and two or three other places this clearly authorizes the licensing of corporations organized in the various States of the Union, also corporations heretofore organized.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. If the gentleman will yield. Of course, there is no objection to the gentleman's language, because the amendment I have offered is an amendment that the law shall not be construed to relieve any of these corporations from the Federal income tax, and there is no objection, of course, to providing to add any additional corporation, because the language ought not to be construed to relieve any corporation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana as amended by the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from New Jersey rise?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk be authorized to renumber the sections following section 17.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, that will be done.

There was no objection.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I further ask unanimous consent that the Clerk may amend the bill by striking out the word "chapter" wherever it occurs in the caption and inserting the word "title."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

CHAPTER XIII.—UNCONSTITUTIONALITY OF PART OF ACT NOT TO AFFECT THE REMAINDER.

SEC. 30. That this act shall supersede the provisions of any other law of the District in conflict therewith. Should any section or provision of this act be held unconstitutional or invalid, the constitutionality or validity of the act as a whole or of any part thereof, other than the part so held unconstitutional or invalid, shall not be affected.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 37, line 4, add a new section, as follows:

"Sec. 31. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal is hereby reserved."

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that is quite the language we usually use, but I do not recall the exact language. I ask unanimous consent to insert the words "this act" after the word "repeal."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment. I move to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is not in order at the present time, the entire bill having been read, and the Chair recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BLANTON. This is a preferential motion at any time before the committee rises.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I think this motion is not in order after the entire bill has been read and a new section added.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the motion is in order at any time before the committee rises, and therefore will put the motion of the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the yeas seemed to have it.

Upon a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON), there were—ayes 16, yeas 46.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with amendments, with the recommentation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. WALSH having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. McARTHUR, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill S. 2265, had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a separate vote demanded upon any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Texas to recommit the bill to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced the yeas appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 14, noes 45.

So the motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the yeas appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 44, noes 8.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote because there is no quorum present, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order there is no quorum present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Will the gentleman withhold his motion a moment?

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is a point of no quorum pending. The gentleman from Wyoming moves that the House do now adjourn.

ADJOURNMENT.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, February 23, 1922, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

549. A letter from the Assistant Secretary of Labor, transmitting a list of useless papers in the office of the Solicitor of the Department of Labor to be disposed of in accordance with law; to the Committee on Disposition of Useless Executive Papers.

550. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting offer made by the Alabama Power Co. proposing to complete the Wilson Dam at Muscle Shoals, Ala. (H. Doc. No. 192); to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. SINNOTT: Committee on the Public Lands. H. R. 10002. A bill to extend the provisions of section 2455, United States Revised Statutes, to the lands within the abandoned Fort Fetterman Military Reservation in the State of Wyoming; without amendment (Rept. No. 720). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. SHREVE: A bill (H. R. 10559) making appropriations for the Departments of Commerce and Labor for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes; committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered to be printed.

By Mr. HIMES: A bill (H. R. 10560) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise a suitable site and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building for the use and accommodation of the post office and other governmental offices at Canton, Ohio, at a cost not to exceed $500,000, and to sell the present building and site; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. PRINGEY: A bill (H. R. 10561) to pay the balance due the Loyal Creek Indians on the award made by the Senate on February 16, 1903; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. CROWTHER: A bill (H. R. 10562) to amend section 300 of the war risk insurance act as amended; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. SWING: A bill (H. R. 10563) to authorize the leasing of unallotted lands on Indian reservations; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. APPLEBY: A bill (H. R. 10577) to create a new division of the Bureau of Education, to be known as the Federal motion-picture commission, and defining its powers and duties; to the Committee on Education.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BURTON: A bill (H. R. 10564) granting an increase of pension to Ruby J. C. Furlong; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 10565) granting an increase of pension to Charles A. Streeter; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 10566) for the relief of May B. Rollins; to the Committee on Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 10567) for the relief of Emanuel Lieberman; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. DALE: A bill (H. R. 10568) granting a pension to Bessie B. Waldo Howland; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HUDSPETH: A bill (H. R. 10569) granting a pension to Samuel P. Keynon; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 10570) granting a pension to Jasper H. B. Norfleet; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. LOGAN: A bill (H. R. 10571) granting a pension to Lizzie C. Thayer; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. MOORES of Indiana: A bill (H. R. 10572) granting an increase of pension to Lewis C. Jones; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. RHODES: A bill (H. R. 10573) granting an increase of pension to Harry L. Hoff; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SWANK: A bill (H. R. 10574) granting a pension to Frederick Dose; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WASON: A bill (H. R. 10575) granting a pension to Otis C. Mooney; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WISE: A bill (H. R. 10576) for the relief of H. H. Dean; to the Committee on Appropriations.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

4224. By the SPEAKER (by request): Memorial adopted by the Ketchikan Commercial Club, of Ketchikan, Alaska, for the protection of salmon fisheries of Alaska; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

4225. By Mr. BARBOUR: Petition of Harold W. Roberts Post, No. 466, Veterans of Foreign Wars, of San Francisco, Calif., re the Wadsworth-McKenzie bill; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

4226. By Mr. CLAGUE: Petition of numerous citizens residing at Wells and Belview, Minn., asking that the Government Grain Corporation be revived; to the Committee on Agriculture.

4227. By Mr. FENN: Petition of Mount Aetna Commandery, Knights of Malta, in support of Towner-Sterling educational bill (H. R. 7); to the Committee on Education.

4228. Also, memorial of the Connecticut Chamber of Commerce, remonstrating against transfer of control of national forests from the Department of Agriculture to the Department of the Interior; also remonstrating against passage of House bill 7542, unless it be so amended as to protect the Roosevelt-Sequoia National Park from water-power developments, except as existing national parks are protected; to the Committee on Agriculture.

4229. By Mr. FULLER: Petition of 202 citizens of Rockford, Ill., asking for the immediate enactment of the Fordney tariff bill, with adequate protective rates, based on American labor costs and the American standard of living; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

4230. By Mr. GALLIVAN: Petition of the Milk Dealers' Association of Boston, Mass., urging favorable action on House bill 7459, relative to the manufacture and sale of "filled-milk" products; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

4231. Also, petitions of Louis G. Connell, of 511 Talbot Avenue, Dorchester, Mass., and other constituents of the twelfth Massachusetts district, urging early and favorable action on the Tinkham bill (H. R. 9805); to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

4232. By Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania: Resolutions of the Pittsburgh Chamber of Commerce, opposing the passage of the adjusted compensation bill; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

4233. Also, resolutions of the Braddock (Pa.) Chamber of Commerce, favoring the passage of the adjusted compensation bill; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

4234. By Mr. KISSEL: Petition of the Central Trades and Labor Council of New York City, N. Y., urging the passage of House bill 10034; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

4235. Also, petition of James R. Williston, Esq., of New York City, N. Y., protesting against the soldiers' bonus legislation; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

4236. Also, petition of the Warner Sugar Refining Co., of New York City, N. Y., protesting against the 60 per cent tariff on Cuban raw sugars; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

4237. By Mr. THOMPSON: Petition of Local 667, International Association of Machinists, of Van Wert, Ohio, opposing a sales tax to provide payment of soldiers' bonus; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 23, 1922.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. J. Muir, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, again we recognize the hand that is blessing us. Again we put our lives before Thee asking for Thy direction, so that every course we may take may be agreeable to Thy mind and will, and that in all the duties of the day we may find ourselves in happy correspondence with those high and holy purposes which shall meet with Thine approval. The Lord our God be our portion always. Through Jesus Christ. Amen.

The VICE PRESIDENT resumed the chair.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. Jones of Washington and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

DISPOSITION OF USELESS PAPERS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Assistant Secretary of Labor, transmitting, pursuant to law, a list of papers and documents on the files of the Department of Labor which are not needed in the conduct of business and having no permanent value or historic interest, and asking for action looking to their disposition, which was referred to a Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments. The Vice President appointed Mr. STERLING and Mr. McKELLAR members of the committee on the part of the Senate, and ordered that the Secretary notify the House of Representatives thereof.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. NELSON presented a petition of sundry citizens of Terrace, Sedan, Murdock, Broton, and Sunburg, all in the State of Minnesota, praying for the enactment of legislation reviving the Government Grain Corporation so as to stabilize prices of certain farm products, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. CAPPER presented a petition of sundry business men and citizens of Independence, Kans., praying for the passage of the so-called soldiers' bonus bill, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PHIPPS presented a memorial of sundry citizens of the State of Colorado remonstrating against the enactment of Senate bill 1948, providing for compulsory Sunday observance in the District of Columbia, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. WILLIS presented a letter in the nature of a petition from Local Union No. 4, American Flint and Glass Workers' Union, of Newark, Ohio, praying for inclusion in the pending tariff bill of an adequate protective duty on flint glass based on American valuation, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Bucyrus Lodge No. 1321, International Association of Machinists, of Bucyrus, Ohio, favoring the making of all munitions and war equipment in Government plants, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LADD presented a resolution adopted by Minot Lodge No. 765, International Association of Machinists, of Minot, N. Dak., favoring the making of all munitions and war equipment in Government plants, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of Aug. Honeyman and 35 others of Havelock, N. Dak., and vicinity, praying for the enactment of legislation reviving the Government Grain Corporation, so as to stabilize prices of certain farm products, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. NEWBERRY presented a petition of the Houghton (Mich.) Association of Commerce, praying for the passage of the so-called Lehlbach reclassification bill, which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service.

He also presented a petition of the Detroit (Mich.) Federation of Labor, praying for the enactment of legislation permitting the manufacture and sale of light wines and beer, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Detroit, Mich., praying for the passage of the so-called Dyer antilynching bill, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Columbia Community Center, of Detroit, Mich., favoring relief for the suffering peoples of Austria by deferring payment for 20 years of Austria's debt, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Iron Mountain Commercial Club, of Iron Mountain, and the Houghton Association of Commerce, of Houghton, both in the State of Michigan, favoring the enactment of legislation for improvement of the St. Lawrence River so as to admit ocean-going vessels to the Great Lakes, which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

NATIONAL SCREW THREAD COMMISSION.

Mr. POMERENE (for Mr. KENYON), from the Committee on Manufactures, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 227) extending the term of the National Screw Thread Commission for a period of five years from March 21, 1922, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 511) thereon.

RELIEF OF FARMERS IN CROP-FAILURE AREAS.

Mr. LADD. Mr. President, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry I report back favorably, with amendments, the bill (S. 2897) to appropriate $5,000,000 for the purchase of seed grain to be supplied to farmers in the crop-failure areas of the United States, said amount to be expended under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture. As it is a matter of emergency, I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The first amendment was, in section 1, on page 1, line 4, after the word "farmers," to insert "for feed to relieve animals," and at the end of line 6, after the word "purchase," to insert the words "of feed and," so as to read:

That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized, for the crop of 1922, to make advances or loans to farmers for feed to relieve animals in the crop-failure areas of the United States, where he shall find that special need for such assistance exists, for the purchase of feed and of wheat, oats, barley, and flaxseed for seed purposes, and, when necessary, to procure such seed and sell same to such farmers. Such advances, loans, or sales shall be made upon such terms and conditions and subject to such regulations as the Secretary of Agriculture shall prescribe, including an agreement by each farmer to use the seed thus obtained by him for the production of grain or flaxseed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 4, after the word "therefor" and before the period, to insert "or in the case of loan for feed for the relief of live stock, the lien shall be made on the live stock," so as to read:

A first lien on the crop to be produced from seed obtained through a loan, advance, or sale made under this section shall, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, be deemed sufficient security therefor, or in the case of loan for feed for the relief of live stock the lien shall be made on the live stock.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator in charge of the bill please explain it to the Senate?

Mr. LADD. In the southwestern part of North Dakota, in portions of Montana, in portions of South Dakota, and in portions of Montana they have had several years of drought, six years in some of those sections. The farmers during the past year had the promise of a good crop, until July. It looked as though they would produce 20 or 30 bushels per acre, but just then, as sometimes has happened in that western country, hot winds came from the south and completely destroyed all their crops in six counties and in parts of other adjoining counties in North Dakota as well as in other States. This was the fifth or sixth failure for that section of the country.

One would think, perhaps, that in that dry region the land is unsuited for agriculture. The rainfall, it is true, is not large, being about 14 inches, but until 1917 they always had large crops. It is a new country, with about 50,000 to 60,000 people.

This year a new condition has come, in that the crop was not only completely destroyed by the hot wind and the rust that followed, but within the past 30 days since the bill was originally introduced the snowfall, which is unusual in that country, is over 2 feet deep and is frozen. There was almost no feed. The farmers had hoped that the cattle might get a part of their feed from the open fields during the winter, but the snow having come to the depth of 2 feet and frozen the animals are unable to secure any feed whatever from that source. The supply of feed is practically all gone and the animals are dying in great numbers.

I am not proposing in the bill nor is my colleague [Mr. McCUMBER] proposing a donation to these people, but it can readily be seen that their financial power is exhausted. They are new settlers, just getting started, the majority of them having been there only 12 or 13 years. Their farms are mortgaged to the limit. Naturally, in order to purchase animals and erect buildings their credit at the bank was exhausted after a failure of crops for five or six years, and they have no means to secure help unless the Federal Government comes to their aid and loans them the money, under the charge of the Secretary of Agriculture, who will arrange for the loans, for a lien on the crops and on the stocks, and the farmers will repay the loans as soon as they secure a crop. The crop conditions appear to be favorable this year.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I think I understand the bill now, and I desire to make merely this suggestion: If the Senator will substitute the words "boll weevil" for the word "drought," his description of his part of the country and the calamities that fell upon it would fit my own. I ask the Senator in all earnestness and kindness if I introduce a similar bill for a loan to the people of my section, ruined by the boll weevil, will he support it?

Mr. LADD. I certainly will.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I just came into the Chamber. If the bill is not too long, I would like to have it read again.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill has not yet been fully reported. It is being read for amendments. It will be reported for the information of the Senate.

The Assistant Secretary read the bill, as proposed to be amended.

Mr. BORAH. I would like to ask some member of the Committee on Agriculture, or I will address my inquiry to the chairman of the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, what is the status of the legislation with reference to deferring payments on reclamation projects?

Mr. McNARY. In answer to the Senator from Idaho I will say that the bill has been reported favorably by the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation. Wide discretion is given to the Secretary of the Interior by the provisions of the bill to designate particular instances where payments should be deferred. The bill is on the calendar, and I hope within a week to call it up for consideration.

Mr. BORAH. Does the bill provide simply for deferring the payments for one year or for a longer period?

Mr. McNARY. It provides for the postponement of construction charges or water rights for two years, with a charge of 5 per cent per annum on deferred payments. It has nothing to do, however, with the pending bill. There is no analogy between the measures. There is a precedent for the pending legislation found in last year's annual agricultural appropriation act, where the Senate provided an appropriation of $2,000,000 to take care of people in the drought-stricken regions, who are not in the vicinity of the irrigation projects but are dry farmers alone.

Mr. BORAH. I understand it has no relevancy or relationship, so far as legislation is concerned, but it is all designed to meet one proposition, and that is to enable farmers to save their homes and farms.

Mr. McNARY. Of course, that is the general tenor of all beneficial legislation of this character.

Mr. BORAH. That is the reason why I thought it would be interesting to know whether we are going to save those on the reclamation projects as well as the others.

Mr. McNARY. I can assure the Senator from Idaho that there will be no lagging in the proposition at all. The pending bill is to take care of those living in the drought-stricken regions who engage in dry farming and enable them to procure seed. The Government has aided them twice formerly.

Mr. BORAH. I understand that.

Mr. McNARY. Part of the money has been returned and part of it has not. The committee reported unanimously in favor of the bill introduced by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], and whatever disposition is made of the bill introduced by that Senator, I can assure the distinguished Senator from Idaho the other bill will be cared for in a few days.

Mr. BORAH. I am very glad to have that assurance. I did not mean by any question I asked to imply that the committee had been recreant to its duty at all, but I did mean to say that the legislation basically is the same in one instance as in the other, and that is to protect those who have farms from being sold out. I wanted to feel that action was to be had, otherwise it might be practicable to attach that proposition as an amendment here.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I desire to supplement what has been said by my colleague, the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LADD], with reference to the conditions of the southwestern part of the State of North Dakota. My colleague has properly stated that there has been a succession of crop failures, which in some counties in North Dakota have run through a period of five or six years. The banks of the vicinity have loaned to the extent to which they are permitted to grant credit; the counties have gone as far as their constitutional tax limitation would allow them to go. The lands were plowed back ready for the 1922 spring seeding, but the farmers, on account of the drought of last year, are entirely without seed. It is necessary that they be furnished seed, or else there are whole counties not more than 20 per cent of whose acreage will be put in crop at all.

Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] that the farming condition throughout the United States is such that in the irrigated districts it will be necessary to allow time for the payment of the amounts that will be due the Government of the United States; that it will be necessary in some instances where advances have been made by the Government to grant a year or two and to allow the farmers to raise a crop in order to make their payments.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President—

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, in looking over the bill I find that it provides for a lien on the crop to be produced from the seed furnished under the appropriation. The bill also provides that where the grain is used for feed it shall be regarded as a lien on the live stock. Would not the Senator from North Dakota be willing to go further in this matter and provide that the grain thus used shall constitute a lien on the real estate? I am disposed to be friendly toward the measure, and I want to help in granting this relief, but at the same time we must realize the fact that these are public funds, and we ought to have as much security as may be reasonably obtained.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not think the Senator from Ohio fully understands the purposes of the pending measure. There is no intention of feeding to live stock the grain which is obtained for seed; there is no provision of that kind in the bill. There is, however, an amendment which allows $1,000,000 of the $5,000,000 to be used with which to buy feed, so that one-fifth of the total amount may be used to buy hay or buy anything that may be used for feed, and for such amount as may thus be used there will be a lien upon the live stock.

The grain itself that is bought for seed must, under the terms of the bill, be used for seed purposes. If the farmers get a crop from the seed the Government will have a first lien upon that crop, but if they do not get a crop from the seed I do not think the Government ought to claim a lien upon the land itself. The land itself is now mortgaged, in most instances, for about all that it is worth. If the farmers could get anything more than they have in the shape of a mortgage upon their lands by obtaining a second or a third mortgage or any kind of a lien, they would buy the seed themselves; they would not come to Congress for aid. They can not get the money on an additional mortgage; the banks can not help them out. It is almost a case of starvation so far as they are concerned.

I wish also to refer to the live-stock matter, as to which my colleague did not fully go into the details. In the last three days I have received more than 300 telegrams from the live-stock section of the State, from banks and from private individuals. They estimate that the loss of life amongst live stock will range all the way from 30 to 75 per cent of all of the live stock which is raised in that section of the country unless they get immediate relief. As explained by my colleague, the farmers, on account of the drought, did not even raise sufficient hay last year, but they hoped for an open winter, which we sometimes have. In such an open winter, with the buffalo grass of that section, the farmers can do some feeding outside, but with 2 feet of snow and a crust frozen over that every foot of pasture is gone, and now the farmers must rely entirely upon feeding. With the lien the Government will have upon the live stock it will be protected if that live stock can be saved. So, Mr. President, I ask that we may rush this measure through as quickly as possible. I agree also with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] that each section of the country should have the relief that is necessary to care for its needs.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I gave notice that I would call up the treaty with Japan immediately on the conclusion of the routine morning business. I do not wish to object to this bill, but if it is going to lead to protracted debate I shall have to ask for the regular order.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I understand unanimous consent has already been given.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate is proceeding under unanimous consent.

Mr. LODGE. Unanimous consent has been given to consider the bill?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; and I will say to the Senator that I think it will only take a few minutes to dispose of it.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, as a rule I am very glad to accept and do accept the opinion expressed by Senators from the States who have these matters in charge. There comes to my desk and that of every other Senator every morning a statement of loans made to farmers in 16 or 17 States. I approve of what is being done in that regard, and I am anxious to aid the farmer at all times. I presume that the farmers in every State in the Union might bring forth, as the Senator from Georgia has stated, some reason why they should have aid and assistance from the Federal Government. These loans, I imagine, may continue from now until the end of time, but whether or not the making of them is really an advantage to those engaged in agriculture I am unable definitely to determine. I believe that such matters ought always to be thoroughly thrashed out before the proper committee, and for that reason I rarely rise on the floor of the Senate to discuss measures of this kind.

In this instance I am not surprised at the statement of the Senator from North Dakota that the banks are rather loath to make loans to the particular farmers who would be the beneficiaries of this bill. He stated that they were new residents; that they had been in the locality for only a few years—I think some 10 or 12 years—and that they had suffered six crop failures. It would appear to me that rather poor security is afforded to the Federal Government in making loans under such conditions.

I am not going to object to this bill; I am going to vote for it, I suppose; but just how far the Government ought to go along this line of business, I am at a loss to understand. I assume that I must also vote for the bill which has been presented by the Senator from Georgia, and we have troubles also in the State which I have the honor in part to represent; but we have never asked the Federal Government for a loan, and up to this time have never received a loan from the Federal Government.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President—

Mr. FERNALD. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. The States in the cotton belt are under mortgage now to the extent of $500,000,000. Half of the farms of the cotton belt are under mortgage, and they would not, in my judgment, if forced to sale to-day, bring enough to pay off the encumbrance. A typical instance is this: A two-horse farmer, owning 123 acres of land, made one bale of cotton on 20 acres. At the suggestion of my friend, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], I will state that a one-horse farm means, as a rule, 30 acres under cultivation, sometimes slightly less and sometimes slightly more. In this case there must have been two plows, because there were 20 acres in cotton, and a farm of 123 acres would readily allow two horses or even three, perhaps; but the farm being under mortgage and the entire expense of cultivation having been incurred, including the support of the owner's family, the payment of wages and the support of the labor, the farmer made only one bale.

Of course, the Senator can realize that that means ruin, for the Senator can see what 500 pounds of cotton, say, at 20 cents a pound would come to; it would not pay for the support of the family. That man had to leave his farm; he was offering it for sale and trying to find a purchaser the last I heard of him. The case is typical.

I received a telegram yesterday about my own farm very much to the same effect. I had to telegraph back offering to do for my tenant just what the Senator from North Dakota is trying to have the Government do for his constituents. In that case I would have had an equitable claim for a loan from the Government for the tenants, not for myself. The circumstances of that case apply throughout the South. I actually believe that the mortgaged farms in the South to-day would not sell for enough to pay off the debts, and the farmers are quitting their farms because of the complete failure of crops owing to the boll weevil.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, I thank the Senator; and I know the conditions are exactly as stated, and it may be said that the farmers in every other State in the Union are likewise laboring under difficulties. In the case of the State of Maine, for instance, we have trouble with our potato crop. The farmers to-day have 37,000,000 bushels of potatoes which they can not sell for what it cost to produce them. So we might start from the Orient and go to the Occident, and in every State we would find farmers in trouble.

If this condition exists and this is the policy to be pursued by the United States Government, then we want to continue it, as the Senator from Georgia has stated; but the attention of the people of the country ought to be brought to what Congress is doing along this line.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President—

Mr. FERNALD. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I hope I will be understood. I have always favored governmental loans on land and on the products of the land. I have always favored direct loans by the Government to the people. Therefore I am going to support the bill of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, I will not detain the Senate longer.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I am a member of the Agricultural Committee, which examined this bill and reported it out favorably. I supported it in the committee and shall support it here. There are exceptions to all rules, Mr. President and Senators, and this is one of the exceptions.

I sympathize with the situation described by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON]. My own section of the South experienced exactly the same condition with the boll weevil when it first appeared a number of years ago. We suffered terribly and are suffering somewhat now; but I believe we are all getting enough to eat, and our live stock are not starving. The evidence before the Agricultural Committee showed that the people out in these portions of North Dakota and Montana have scarcely food enough to eat, and their work animals are literally starving. It is a bad situation and calls for exceptional treatment. It is comparable to other conditions which have occurred in our Republic and in other parts of the world when our Government has gone to the relief of the suffering. I have seen situations similar to this in the Mississippi Valley, when by a tremendous overflow of the Mississippi River many counties were submerged, thousands of people driven from their homes, their live stock destroyed, their ability to make a crop for that year completely frustrated, and the Congress has come to their relief.

In this case the evidence before the committee showed that for five consecutive years the crops in that section have been almost a complete failure, due to no fault of the people themselves, not due to indifference, laziness, or any lack of effort. The testimony showed that they had a wonderful crop last year until about the middle of the month of July, when warm winds swept over their fields and shriveled them, destroying food for man and beast. It is a different situation, Senators, from the boll-weevil menace; it is different from that existing anywhere else in the United States. It is a small section, but very important. We are merely lending these stricken people our credit to give them seed to plant their crops and to feed their work animals for a brief period. I hope it will be considered one of the exceptions which prove the rule in every instance, and that the Senate will not hesitate but will pass this bill promptly.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] a question. He says there is a precedent for this, and that some years ago we appropriated $2,000,000, and that some of the money has been paid back. How much of it has been paid back?

Mr. McNARY. The Senator means with respect to this extension of governmental credit?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. Last year the annual Agricultural appropriation bill carried an item of $2,000,000. One million nine hundred and some-odd thousand dollars was loaned to the farmers in the drought-stricken regions, mainly in North Dakota, the eastern part of Montana, and the eastern part of the State of Washington. About 50 per cent of it has been returned to the Government.

Mr. OVERMAN. Another question: The Senator said that this money was for the purpose of buying seed for dry farming. I want to know something about this dry farming. Is it a success? It seems that for six years they have failed to raise a crop. What is the Senator's experience? What can he tell us about dry farming, as to whether or not it is a success?

Mr. McNARY. I will say to the Senator from North Carolina that I am a very experienced farmer; but I farm in a moist, humid country, where we have plenty of rainfall. I am not an experienced, scientific dry farmer, like the Senator from Idaho, but I do know that over a period of a great many years dry farming has proven profitable. Unfortunately, however, in this particular district drought has stricken the farmers; but last year it was not a question of drought. It was a question of hot winds at the time when the milk was in the seed. This year the prospects for a crop are excellent, on account of the great quantity of snow that has fallen in the mountains, and that will conserve and preserve the moisture until late in the season; and I have no doubt that unless something unusual should arise the farmers will have an abundant crop.

Mr. OVERMAN. Dry farming is a success in this country, then, is it?

Mr. McNARY. I should say that dry farming is a success, although I am not an experienced dry farmer. I am the other kind.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, I sympathize greatly with these people, and I am perfectly willing to make the appropriation as a matter of charity; but as a business matter, for this Government to make a loan with security on lands or cattle or grain where there is a crop only every other year, or half of the time, seems to me a very poor proposition.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] referred to the dry-farming proposition.

Mr. OVERMAN. I was just asking for information, because I wanted to know.

Mr. BORAH. I understand; the Senator was asking in regard to whether it is a success or not. In some respects it can hardly be said to have been a success. Nevertheless, there are vast areas of land in the West where dry farming has been carried on which have been reclaimed in a successful way, and communities have been built up; but I can assure the Senator that it has been after a very long, tedious, hard, sacrificing struggle upon the part of the farmers. They have gone there, however, land hungry and home hungry, and they have remained with the task which is before them in a way which is worthy of the highest commendation for citizenship and courage. In some of the areas in the West where they have had dry farming they have been successful; in others not so successful. However, in my opinion, ultimately dry farming will prove altogether beneficial to the western country.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 11, after the word "available," to insert "of which not more than $1,000,000 may be used for the purchase of feed for the relief of live stock," so as to read:

The total amount of such advances, loans, or sales to any one farmer shall not exceed the sum of $300. All such advances or loans shall be made through such agencies as the Secretary of Agriculture shall designate. For carrying out the purposes of this section there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000,000, to be immediately available, of which not more than $1,000,000 may be used for the purchase of feed for the relief of live stock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to appropriate $5,000,000 for the purchase of seed grain and of feed to be supplied to farmers in the crop-failure areas of the United States, said amount to be expended under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture."

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CUMMINS:

A bill (S. 3187) to amend section 2 of the act entitled "An act to save daylight and to provide standard time for the United States," approved March 19, 1918; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

A bill (S. 3188) to amend section 24 of the Judicial Code; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. TRAMMELL:

A bill (S. 3189) providing that freight and passenger rates shall not be increased without authority of the Interstate Commerce Commission and providing that shippers shall be given at least 60 days' notice of hearings on application for increase in rates; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

By Mr. MCCUMBER:

A bill (S. 3190) to provide for the applicability of the pension laws to certain classes of persons in the military and naval services not entitled to the benefits of article 3 of the war risk insurance act as amended (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. POMERENE:

A bill (S. 3191) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise a suitable site and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building for the use and accommodation of the post office and other governmental offices at Canton, Ohio, at a cost not to exceed $500,000, and to sell the present building and site; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. CALDER:

A bill (S. 3192) for the promotion of certain officers of the United States Army now on the retired list; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—ELLEN M. WILLEY.

On motion of Mr. JONES of Washington, it was Ordered, That the papers accompanying the bill (S. 3489, 66th Cong., 2d sess.) granting a pension to Ellen M. Willey be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, no adverse report having been made thereon.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—BARBARA KURNER.

On motion of Mr. ELKINS, it was Ordered, That the papers filed with the bill (S. 697) for the relief of Barbara Kurner be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, no adverse report having been filed thereon.

BUSINESS RELATIONS WITH MEXICO.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have here a copy of a report made by the Texas Chamber of Commerce of an investigation conducted by that body into the relations between this country and Mexico. It is brief and contains some very important information. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the communication was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEXICO.

GENERAL HEADQUARTERS TEXAS CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Houston, Tex., February 10, 1922.

To the Members of the Texas Chamber of Commerce.

GENTLEMEN: During the past several months members of your board have been giving study to the question of developing closer business relations with our southern neighbor, the Republic of Mexico.

On January 16 and 17 a meeting of representatives of Mexico and Texas commercial organizations was held at Laredo, Tex., under the auspices of the Texas Commercial Executives' Association. This meeting was attended by many prominent men, resulting in a comprehensive understanding of the problems to be met.

Following the Laredo meeting, and for the purpose of obtaining first-hand information, the writer visited Mexico City and now desires to briefly present his conclusions and submit certain recommendations.

For a period of 10 years prior to 1921 the Republic of Mexico was in turmoil, one revolution following another, as a result of ambitious men or parties seeking to direct and control the destiny of its people, resulting in political and financial chaos, worthless currency, and limited national credit.

The present administration has made surprising progress in restoring confidence by adopting a metallic currency, rehabilitating transportation, and aiming to establish sound commercial relations with the United States and other nations.

That a stable Government has been in existence for more than a year can not be questioned. However, the present constitution of Mexico, revised and adopted in the year 1917, contains certain provisions that, while they may be sound in theory, are absolutely impractical in meeting immediate needs.

I refer particularly to article 27, which vests title to all lands, as well as all minerals in or under such lands or waters in the Federal Government. The purpose of this article was clearly to exclude foreign investment in either land or minerals. The effect is to not only prevent acquisition, but to prevent foreign loans on lands or minerals. A further and more serious effect is to add doubt and uncertainty regarding the future among the large landowners on which the Republic has been dependent for its food supply, a source of apprehension among thoughtful and foresighted citizens who have the present and future welfare of Mexico at heart.

However, these are internal questions, and, whether wise or unwise, are not open to change by foreign Governments, corporations, or individuals and must be settled by the Mexican people themselves, and should be taken into account to the extent only of guiding our policy pertaining to investments or loans and would seem to confine our commercial contact to trade in the form of purchase or sale of commodities.

The population of Mexico is now estimated at upward of 16,000,000 people. Its foreign trade with the United States has grown rapidly as shown by the figures below:

	Imports (into U. S.)	Exports (from U. S.)	Total.
1921.....	$119,445,532	$221,844,304	$341,289,837
1920.....	179,331,755	207,858,497	387,190,252
1916.....	105,035,730	54,270,283	159,306,013
1911.....	57,450,111	61,281,315	118,731,426
1906.....	50,965,177	58,182,278	109,147,455
1901.....	28,851,635	36,475,350	65,326,985

Of the 1921 trade with the United States, Mexico purchased to the value of $221,844,304 in gold. Complete figures upon various articles bought by Mexico during 1921 are not yet available, but figures upon the commodities exported through the San Antonio-Laredo district (only one of the four customs districts of Texas) during the first 11 months of 1921 should be of interest to citizens of our State:

Cattle.....	$3,354,117
Hogs.....	279,066
Horses and mules.....	354,116
Sheep.....	280,809
Eggs.....	1,259,951
Corn.....	6,465,476
Wheat.....	1,463,811
Butter.....	70,791
Wheat flour.....	690,747

The national debt of Mexico as of June 30, 1921—Independent of railroad obligations assumed by the Government—is reported by the Mexican minister of finance at 563,526,517 (pesos), which is the equivalent of $281,763,258.50 in terms of United States money. This debt, it will be noted, is very moderate as compared with the national debt of the United States and European nations, and under proper laws and administration Mexico should promptly attain a strong financial position. However, at this time the people are being heavily taxed, prices for necessities are extremely high, and a large amount of unemployment exists, resulting in considerable discontent. The unsatisfactory situation is accentuated by political graft through irresponsible individuals, who look selfishly to their personal welfare rather than the general welfare.

Texas, with its extensive Mexican border line of more than 1,000 miles, is particularly interested in aiding in the stabilization of Mexico.

I take it that our membership are agreed that Mexico is justified in aiming to prevent the exploitation of her resources and her people by foreigners. Further, that the people of our State, living under the most advanced form of government ever developed by man, are not egotistical enough to assume that our experience with its administration justifies our assuming to direct or dictate to a people where civilization is known to have existed for centuries previous to development of our form of government.

The recommendations it is proposed to submit for consideration are: First, That the Government of Mexico be immediately recognized, under such conditions as will insure to our citizens protection of life and the safeguarding of property rights under the Constitution and the law existing at the time such property was or is acquired.

Second, That all unnecessary restrictions regarding trade and travel, including skilled or unskilled labor, be removed.

Third, That, as applied to the Republic of Mexico, a so-called bargaining tariff be adopted, thus permitting executive changes or adjustments as conditions demand.

Fourth, That the international automobile highway extending from our capital—Austin—to the capital of the Republic—Mexico City—as recommended at the Laredo meeting above referred to, receive our hearty indorsement and support as an additional means of intercourse between Mexico and the State of Texas.

Your comments or suggestions will be appreciated.

Yours, very truly,

J. S. CULLINAN, President.

Resolution of executive committee, Texas Chamber of Commerce,
February 8, 1922.

Whereas, since the closing of the Diaz administration, the United States Government has declined to recognize the Republic of Mexico; and Whereas the commerce, business, and social relations of the State of Texas, bordering on Mexico for a distance of more than a thousand miles, is being seriously hampered under existing conditions; and Whereas the administration of President Alvaro Obregon has demonstrated its capacity to govern Mexico and protect the life, liberty, and property of its subjects and of other nationals: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we respectfully recommend that our State Department at Washington immediately recognize the existing government of Mexico under such conditions and stipulations as will insure protection to life and the safeguarding of property of our citizens under the Constitution and the laws existing at the time such property was or is acquired: Be it further

Resolved, That passport regulations, head tax, and like impediments to the freest practicable trade and travel be modified or repealed: Be it further

Resolved, That as applied to the Republic of Mexico, we urge that a basis of bargaining tariff be adopted that will permit of executive changes or adjustments to meet changing conditions as they arise: Be it further

Resolved, That we heartily indorse the project of constructing the international automobile highway between Mexico City and Austin, Tex.

COMMENTS ON CONFERENCE ON LIMITATION OF ARMAMENT.

Mr. BORAH. I ask permission to have printed in the Record in the regular eight-point type an address by former Undersecretary of State Davis upon the Conference on Limitation of Armament and Far Eastern questions.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

COMMENTS AND REFLECTIONS UPON THE CONFERENCE ON THE LIMITATION OF ARMAMENT AND FAR EASTERN QUESTIONS BEFORE THE COUNCIL ON FOREIGN RELATIONS AT THE HOTEL ASTOR, NEW YORK, FRIDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 17, 1922.

(By Hon. Norman H. Davis, formerly Undersecretary of State.)

The achievements of the Conference on the Limitation of Armament and Far Eastern questions have been of considerable importance. First among these was the revival of a state of mind by which attention was directed to the superior benefits of peace and cooperation over those of selfishness and strife.

It is, of course, easy to criticize the failures of the conference. It is easy to show that many important questions still pressing for a solution were not settled and that some of those heralded as happily disposed of may remain sources of future trouble. It is also easy to point out that in so far as any real progress was made it was only by following in the footprints leading to the League of Nations and world-wide cooperation. Our national welfare is, however, too dependent upon the contribution we make to an improvement in international relationships to excuse a partisan, ignorant, or emotional consideration of such a vital question. America and the world have suffered almost to the breaking point, partly as a result of the unfortunate controversies over the work of the Paris peace conference. Real or alleged defects in the treaty of Versailles were allowed to obscure the good and lasting achievements which were not taken advantage of by us. We must accept and hold to the gains secured at the Washington conference, but these may be lost if we fool ourselves into believing that all the necessary objectives have been reached and fail to press forward. It is therefore our duty to take stock and examine any defects and mistakes, not with a view of belittling the good results but for the purpose of correcting the defects or avoiding the mistakes in order to preserve our gains and strive on to greater achievements.

The apparent rapid progress made at the outset in Washington raised undue expectations. It may be that we advanced too rapidly in some directions and not enough in others. Constructive improvement in international relations comes slowly because it is regulated by the rapidity with which the respective nations are prepared to adopt enlightened policies. Each delegation at Washington was restricted by what it was thought the people acting through their Government would accept. In order to appraise the work of the conference it is therefore necessary, not only to survey the principal questions which were causing friction and preventing a decrease in armament for which solutions were sought, but first of all to review the state of national opinion as to the relevant matters involved and the circumstances under which the conference was called. We may then examine more in detail some of the questions in the agenda and consider to what extent the difficulties indicated have been removed, what, if any, false steps have been taken, and what further steps should be taken.

The war aroused a general public demand for measures which would prevent a recurrence of such a catastrophe and relieve the peoples of the burdens growing out of armaments. The first serious attempt to bring this about was through the creation of the League of Nations. With the realization that the problem must be dealt with as a whole; that nations would not reduce or discard their arms without some assurance that their rights and interests would be otherwise protected and secured, the League of Nations was formulated on a comprehensive plan which it was believed would attain this result. More than 50 nations, being convinced of the necessity for world conference and cooperation, joined the league. The United States refused to do so or to otherwise cooperate with these powers in reaching settlements which would restore confidence and facilitate a general world-wide reduction in armaments.

Our failure to do this militated against naval disarmament as well as recovery from the world-wide industrial depression. We could not safely throw up our arms without substituting for them protective agreements with the other powers, and obviously the League of Nations could not take steps for effective disarmament, one of its principal objectives, without the concurrence of the United States, the most powerful Nation. As a result, we continued to increase our Navy, and England and Japan did likewise. I shall not attempt to state why we failed to enter the league. Suffice it to say, we took the opposite course. Embracing the fiction that we were not concerned with outside controversies, we spurned this opportunity for service and leadership.

As the tide of passion and prejudice, which came in the aftermath of the war, began to subside, our vision and higher qualities began to emerge, the myth of American isolation began to vanish, and the necessity for international cooperation became more apparent. As Europe's economic collapse spread to the United States as a result of her contracted purchasing power, it began to be seen and admitted that we were concerned in outside questions, at least in those of an economic character. Developments soon showed that Europe's failure to recover industrially was primarily due to political policies, actuated by fear or greed, which prevented a restoration of confidence and stability—the prerequisites to economic recovery—and to a failure to reduce armaments and taxes; and therefore that industry and commerce would not recover in advance of political security and the adoption of political policies which would set the economic forces free. In the Far East, trouble and friction were increasing because of the efforts of certain powers to secure for themselves preferential economic and political advantages or controls detrimental to the rights and interests of other nations, as well as to those of the people directly concerned.

It became more apparent that if we were to protect our own economic structure we must change our course and do something definite to assist in the improvement of foreign political and economic conditions, which could be done only by working in concert with the other powers. We began to see how much loss and damage had been caused by our previous failure to realize these facts and to act accordingly, and how unfortunate it was that our participation in world affairs had become the source of such a bitter political controversy that it could not then be dealt with frankly on its merits.

I have held the belief that once the leaders of the present administration were confronted with the same facts and problems which confronted the last administration and with the same solemn official responsibility for decision and action, they would reach substantially the same conclusions and see the wisdom of adopting the same true American course. My belief has been substantially confirmed, except as to our ratification of the treaty of Versailles and entrance into the League of Nations. Some of the Republican Senators opposed in principle our entrance into the league, but the large majority of them, including Senator Harding, professed to favor it in principle, but insisted upon reservations to rectify or remove certain alleged defects. Furthermore, 31 distinguished citizens, many of whom, including our present distinguished Secretary of State, were intellectual leaders in the Republican Party, had in an open letter in 1920 expressed the firm conviction that the United States should ratify the treaty of Versailles and enter the League of Nations, and had assumed the solemn moral responsibility of assuring the American people that the election of Mr. Harding would insure our taking this wise course. We must assume that these views, under the circumstances in which they were given publicity, must have been reached after most earnest and well-matured consideration, and also that these 31 gentlemen still believe as we do that this would have been the wise and logical way to secure world-wide cooperation and to deal with disarmament; otherwise they surely long ago would have so informed the public who in such great numbers placed their faith in that assurance. It must be admitted, however, that the "irreconcilables," although in the minority, professed equal assurance that Mr. Harding if elected would keep us out of the league. Instead of clarifying issues, the 1920 elections confused them. The overwhelming Republican victory obtained by the temporary combination of groups holding most conflicting views gave to each of them an opportunity to claim approval from the people. Whatever may have been Mr. Harding's views as a candidate, as to which there is still a divergence of opinion, he did talk about a new association of nations without involvements, but did not as President show any inclination to enter the existing one, or to give any clear lead as to a possible new one. The public were not told nor could they see what course the administration proposed to take. As a result, the Senate took the initiative in directing our foreign relations.

Shortly after the present administration came into power, and before it had formulated or announced any definite policy in respect to the future relationship of the United States to world problems, it considered itself forced by a resolution of Congress to make a separate peace with Germany. It would seem, however, that this was in accord with the President's own ideas, since he as a Senator had voted for a similar resolution and after election had invited such action. Before negotiations for a separate treaty with Germany were concluded, the administration considered itself again forced to take another step, as a result of a congressional resolution, to call a conference for the limitation of armament.

Obviously the separate peace resolution and the disarmament resolution were attempts by Congress to respond to a public sentiment again becoming articulate, and to an increasing pressure for a solution of the disturbing world problems, in view of the fact that the administration was failing to act or point the way.

The President and the Secretary of State were evidently in possession of facts which convinced them of the inexpediency and futility of attempting to bring about a limitation of armament without the concurrent settlement of other questions so intimately related to, if not the cause for, maintaining and increasing armaments. As a settlement of the various controversies relating to China and Siberia had more relation to naval armament, and as it was probably considered premature to tackle European questions, the scope of the proposed conference was enlarged but practically limited to Far Eastern questions, although conditions in Europe were causing more loss and trouble. There had not been so much controversy or fear over our becoming entangled in Asiatic controversies. Some minds functioned differently in respect to questions in Asia, 7,000 miles to the west of us, than in Europe, 3,000 miles to the east. Future developments may, it is hoped, enable a shortening of mental range, even to the extent of realizing that questions in Europe may have a most important relation to those in Asia and even the Pacific Ocean, and to world peace.

I believe, as did those 31 gentlemen who signed the aforementioned letter, that our logical and safe course was to have entered the League of Nations; or failing in that, the administration should at least have offered some other definite comprehensive plan for world conference and cooperation. Having done neither, it decided to tackle the problems piecemeal and to call a disarmament conference, apparently with the object of thus securing a part of the desired objective. Our invitations to the conference were limited to members of the League of Nations, and in assuming the responsibility of calling it, the United States was compelled to accomplish something or to cause much harm and suffer a further loss of moral prestige. With the specter of the mangled treaty of Versailles hovering over them, and the uncertainty of what plans would meet with approval, our delegates labored under adverse conditions; and as might have been expected, the conference was not an American diplomatic victory.

We may now review the Far Eastern questions included in the agenda of the conference, which were to be taken up in connection with a limitation of naval armament, and see to what extent they have been settled. Most of these relate to the so-called open door, a policy originally announced by the United States, which had by successive interpretations come to mean equal opportunity for all powers in trade and commerce in China and respect by all powers of the territorial and political integrity of China.

All of the powers represented at the conference had for 20 years officially professed to accept this policy, but it was being constantly violated. On account of more recent developments, the United States Government took the position that the principles embodied in this policy should also be applied to Siberia. Japan had been charged with the most serious disregard of these principles in Manchuria, Shantung, Siberia, and Sakhalien.

In 1915 Japan submitted her famous 21 demands, which in effect would have made Manchuria a Japanese Province. The Japanese delegates at Washington announced an intention not to press for acceptance by China of some of the most objectionable of these demands, but this question remains unsettled.

One of the most important questions to be settled was that relating to the Chinese Eastern Railway. This railway, which crosses Manchuria and connects at Manchouli with the Trans-Siberian Railway, belongs to Russia through the nominal ownership of the Russo-Asiatic Bank, and ultimately reverts under certain conditions to China. On account of the vital necessity of this railway for commerce into Manchuria, Siberia, and Russia, the allied and associated powers, constituting themselves as trustees, took control during the war and appointed an inter-allied committee, headed by a distinguished American engineer, Mr. John F. Stevens. This committee has been operating the road in the interests of all concerned pending its return to the owners. Successful operation was prevented, however, by a lack of proper cooperation and because the committee's control did not extend over the Ussuri Railway, which is now in control of Japan and connects the Chinese Eastern with the terminus at Vladivostok, nor over its other outlet at Port Arthur, the terminus of the South Manchurian Railway, which is also under Japanese control. Without the removal of these obstacles it is evident that the operation could not prosper and that the open door would be a joke. No progress was made toward a settlement of this matter.

In Shantung Japan had by force taken over the ex-German interests, the right to which was claimed under secret treaties with the Allies. At the Paris conference the Japanese promised to get out, but did not fix a definite date. At the Washington conference this promise has been made good in part or in full. It is too early to herald a complete and unconditional withdrawal in Shantung, but it is an excellent start. If, however, this withdrawal is to be made at the expense of a more secure hold on Manchuria, and especially on Siberia, it would be a costly one and will not help the situation.

In Siberia the United States has a considerable material interest as well as a moral obligation. For the purpose of extricating certain Czech-Slovak troops in Siberia, and for protecting military supplies at Vladivostok, the United States agreed, in the summer of 1918, to the dispatch of allied troops under an arrangement which provided that the United States and Japan would send there a military expedition of an equal number of forces. Japan at once sent several times her quota. The Czech-Slovak troops were embarked, and in 1920 the American troops were withdrawn. The Japanese forces, although reduced, have not been withdrawn. In spite of the fact that the Japanese Government in August, 1918, at the time of dispatching her troops to Siberia, made an official statement explaining the above object of the expedition and reaffirmed as the Japanese policy that of "respecting the territorial integrity of Russia and abstaining from all intervention in her internal affairs," and furthermore that upon the realization of that object, the troops would be withdrawn, leaving "wholly unimpaired the sovereignty of Russia in all its phases, either political or military."

After the withdrawal of the American troops Japan took control of Vladivostok, which is the door to Manchuria and all of Siberia. Subsequently the Japanese troops occupied the northern half of the island of Sakhalien, which is held as a hostage until Japan receives from Russia satisfaction for certain alleged atrocities committed on the Russian mainland against Japanese troops. The original Japanese pledges have been recently renewed, but now those pledges are contingent upon settlements with Russia satisfactory to Japan, and upon a restoration of order in Siberia, which the Japanese occupation and activities make increasingly difficult. These vital questions remain unsettled, and unless and until they are settled we can not expect peace and stability in the Far East.

The controversy over the island of Yap was settled by our agreeing to Japan's claim for a mandate from the League of Nations over the island, subject to our right to land and operate cables there. It is to be presumed that the league will approve this because this island, which formerly belonged to Germany, is of vital importance for cable communication to the Far East and can serve no other useful purpose.

The Anglo-Japanese alliance was one of the principal obstacles to a settlement of the Far Eastern differences as well as to naval disarmament. As long as the British were allied with the Japanese, they could not act independently in the Far East, and we could not consider the two navies separately. It must be admitted, however, that this alliance was not the sole obstacle to British support, because the British Government has not felt as we have the wisdom and justice of applying to Russia the same principles of nonviolation of political and territorial rights which have been professed in respect to China. There has been little, if any, opposition in England to a dismemberment of Russia, and apparently little support at the Washington conference of our views relating to Siberia. While the British realized the desirability of terminating the Anglo-Japanese alliance, they evidently did not consider it expedient to do so until they knew what our future naval and foreign policy was going to be. On the other hand, they were most desirous for a naval agreement, and equally as desirous as we were for a closer understanding and friendship between the peoples of the British Empire and the United States, which could not be had without the termination of this alliance. Japan had no desire to terminate it and was placed in a position to exact something in exchange.

The first step taken at the conference toward a settlement of the above questions was the proposal submitted by Secretary Hughes to scrap certain battleships already constructed, or in process of construction, and for a period of years to limit further construction, and to retain the status quo of certain fortified islands in the Pacific. This dramatic move gave conclusive proof of our good faith and peaceful intentions, and must have allayed any Japanese fears as to the hostile use of our fleet, because it was not made conditional upon Japan allaying our fears that she might continue her present activities in China and Siberia, of which we had heretofore complained. Besides stopping for at least a number of years the naval competition between England, Japan, and the United States, the naval treaty results in a division of naval spheres of influence. The United States is not permitted to increase fortifications at Guam and the Philippines, which in effect confines our naval operations to American waters. England, being permitted to increase her naval bases at Singapore, Australia, and New Zealand, may transfer a large part of her fleet there, which leaves the British and Japanese fleets in control of the Far East.

We did subsequently get the nine-power treaty, which specifies so clearly the principles by which the powers are to be guided in the maintenance of Chinese integrity. This, in my judgment, is probably the most promising agreement reached at the conference. It is unfortunate that provision was not made for a supervising organization or board with power to apply those principles rather than to report their findings to the respective Governments, but it is after all a fortunate beginning. It is also unfortunate that the spirit of the treaty has already been violated by the refusal to permit China now to levy import duties of more than 5 per cent, especially when other powers levy as high as 200 per cent on certain Chinese goods. This is unfair and unwise; but China came out of the conference with much more than she went in with.

The next step taken to compose the difficulties in the Far East, including ostensibly the abrogation of the Anglo-Japanese alliance, was the four-power treaty between England, France, Japan, and the United States relating to the islands in the Pacific Ocean. It is more difficult to understand why this step was taken and why it was considered necessary. As the Anglo-Japanese alliance was the principal obstacle to an agreement for the limitation of naval armament, it would have been most logical and natural for our naval proposals to be made contingent upon the cancellation of this alliance, which England and Japan most surely would have welcomed and accepted had they been given the opportunity and alternative.

The Anglo-Japanese alliance covered specifically China and India and in effect provided most definitely for the maintenance of the open door, equal opportunities for all nations, and the territorial and political integrity of China. If we were to sign any treaty in substitution of the Anglo-Japanese alliance it should have been the naval treaty, or even the nine-power treaty on Chinese integrity, which is in complete harmony with the preamble of the Anglo-Japanese alliance and which should have been made applicable to Siberia as well as to China. Why cover a new portion of the world, unless it were to switch from land to sea, in order to baptize us into the system of alliances? Could it be that in exchange for the intangible security to Australia and New Zealand, provided for under the Anglo-Japanese alliance, the British preferred a more tangible security from Japan and the United States, or was it to assure Japan that we would not interfere by force in her activities of which we have heretofore complained?

There exists some fear that we may be morally obligated under this treaty to use force. Senator Lodge has explained that no such obligation exists, but in so far as I know he has not made clear just what our obligation is not to use force. It seems to me that we are obligated not to use force without first attempting in conference to adjust any controversy in the Pacific. If a controversy should arise over the failure of one of the powers to keep its pledges in respect to China or Siberia, it is not quite so clear what our rights or duties would be under this treaty. As this and the naval treaty are not in any way conditional upon the observance of those pledges, it would seem that we are in effect estopped from using force in case of non-observance. It would seem therefore that our delegates determined we would not in any event resort to force to secure our rights and interests in the Far East or that they can be properly safeguarded without it. Evidently the principal objective was to relieve all suspicion and tension in the Far East, and the remedy given was for the United States to relieve the tension by the unconditional withdrawal of the pressure. The wisdom of this depends upon future developments and the extent to which moral force and pressure can be applied. There is undoubtedly an overwhelming demand that international disputes be settled without resort to war. I am a firm advocate of this and also of disarmament, but I am convinced that wars can not be prevented merely by discarding obsolete instruments of war. The cessation of naval competition is a wise economic move and also has a tendency to dispel fear and suspicion, but it will not prevent war. The only possible way to prevent wars is to establish some world-wide effective machinery for securing justice and respect for rights without the necessity of resorting to force except in so far as it may be required to support the machinery of justice. Unless and until the United States forms a part of such machinery, which shall include all of the powers, large and small, I am doubtful of the efficacy or wisdom of surrendering our inalienable sovereign right to use force.

President Harding stated in his message to the Senate that the four-power treaty contains "no commitment to armed force, no alliance, no written or moral obligation to join in defense, no express or implied commitment to arrive at agreement except in accordance with your constitutional methods." I do not quite understand what he means by arriving at agreement in accordance with our constitutional methods.

Apparently we are committed beforehand in this treaty to a method of adjusting differences between the parties to the treaty, and in case of aggressive action by an outside power to confer and decide what to do about it. This must mean something, because, as President Harding says, "it is easy to believe, however, that such a conference of the four powers is a moral warning that an aggressive nation, giving affront to the four great powers ready to focus world opinion on a given controversy, would be embarking on a hazardous enterprise." It of course might be unnecessary for these powers to join armed forces to deprive other nations of their rights, but what aggressive nation have they in mind? It is conceivable that China and Russia might some day become aggressive in order to recover their territorial and political integrity, to which the United States has contended they are entitled. Surely we would not want to "focus world opinion" against them or to increase the hazard of such an enterprise by having our hands tied with those who have provoked the aggression.

The explanation for the four-power treaty may be that it was considered a most innocuous way to get rid of the Anglo-Japanese alliance in so much as it means nothing more than to confer. If that is so, is it a wise practice for nations to sign treaties that mean nothing? Will not one nation think it means more than another does and thus cause misunderstanding?

According to an Associated Press dispatch from Tokyo, dated January 31, Baron Uchida, Japanese minister of foreign affairs, in replying to interpellations in the House of Peers, stated in substance that "the four-power treaty was not intended to abrogate the Anglo-Japanese alliance, but rather to widen and extend it." It would seem that instead of getting rid of this alliance we have entered it, enlarged it, and changed the territory covered by it.

This new pact has been praised for its brevity and simplicity. Will the Chinese and Russian peoples feel that it is so simple, innocuous, and meaningless? Is it not very probable they may conclude that we have abandoned our independence of action and traditional friendship for them by entering into a pact with their oppressors? Will not this diminish our prestige and moral influence in the Far East and dishearten the peoples of China and Russia in their struggle to maintain their independence pending the working out of their salvation and the establishment of effective governments?

The powerful influence of America has been due in great measure to our impartial advocacy of justice for all nations and our freedom from alliances with one or more nations which would ignore the rights and claims or even arouse the suspicions of other nations. The hope for peace rests not in this four-power pact, but, if anywhere, in the will of the Japanese people for cooperation and peace and their ability to reverse the imperialistic policy initiated by the militaristic party. Fortunately there appears now to be a growing public sentiment in Japan against her former aggressive policies and a growing realization that it is from every standpoint to the interests of Japan to cooperate with the other powers in applying the open-door principles to Siberia and China. There is no difference in principle between the two territories and nationalities; justice, future peace, and stability can not be served by one or more powers taking advantage of unfortunate political conditions in Russia any more than by doing so in China.

Would it not have been well to incorporate this in a treaty? There should have been no objection if the Japanese pledged to abstain from all intervention in the internal affairs of Russia in Siberia and to retire from there as to be complied with in good faith. This would have strengthened the liberal elements in Japan who advocate her withdrawal from Siberia.

If the military party maintains control of Japan and continues its past policy in respect to Manchuria, Siberia, and Sakhalien the four-power treaty as it now stands may simply tie our hands, protect the Japanese rear, and encourage that party to proceed all the more vigorously with the aggressive policies on the Asiatic mainland. Although these policies were in clear violation of the Anglo-Japanese alliance, the practical effect of that alliance was to assist instead of deter Japan. Now that Japan has refused to evacuate Siberia or to do more than repeat her former pledges to get out after conditions improve to her satisfaction, and the other powers have failed to protest officially against the Japanese actions, was it wise, logical, or necessary for us to bind ourselves unconditionally?

Our liberal and reasonable proposal for a naval holiday created an unusual atmosphere of good will and confidence, which should have facilitated a settlement of the other equally, if not more important, questions for which the conference was likewise called, particularly those relating to Manchuria, the Chinese Eastern Railway, Siberia, and Sakhalien. After we had agreed to stop naval competition and to enter the four-power pact there was, unfortunately, not so much interest shown in settling the other questions.

All that was done toward a world-wide reduction of land armaments was to pass a resolution recommending that the Chinese armies be reduced, while foreign troops are on her soil. Afterwards some good resolutions were passed and agreements reached condemning the use of poisonous gas, and outlawing the use of submarines against merchantmen. It was, however, impossible to agree upon a definition of a merchantman. Because of the limited number of powers represented, these agreed principles could not be embodied in international law, but they may help formulate and enlist the support of public opinion for future action in a world conference.

While the Japanese Government may have been more determined to hold on to Siberia and Manchuria than we were inclined to try to force them out, I am convinced that Japan was just as anxious to avoid trouble as we were. She also knew any possible conflict with us could be easily avoided by a frank compliance with her pledges, but instead she secured from us a pledge of good behavior in the Pacific without giving a reciprocal assurance to cease doing on the Asiatic mainland the very things we have objected to as being unjust and hazardous to peace in the Far East.

Japan owns the southern half of the island of Sakhalien and claims, through occupation, some sort of interest in the northern half. Would an attempt by Russia to recover control there threaten Japanese interests? Suppose Russia should find it necessary to land troops on the southern half in order to recover possession of her northern half? In that case, what would be our obligation or position?

All differences of opinion as to whether or not the Japanese homeland was one of the islands included in the four-power treaty have been cleared up. This never seemed so important to me. The unanswered question in my mind is why was the four-power treaty negotiated and where will it lead us? Certainly it can not remain static. No treaty or alliance does. Few alliances have done what they were intended to do. Is this treaty an alliance or is it merely an agreement to confer before going to war? If it is an alliance, against whom is it directed? It provides that a conference will be held to adjust any differences arising between the parties to this treaty, but also to determine what to do in case of aggressive or disturbing action in the Pacific by some other power not a party to the treaty. Apparently, in the latter case, it would automatically develop into an alliance against other powers. If it is not an alliance against other powers, but is merely an agreement to confer in order to prevent trouble among themselves or with any outside power or to settle amicably questions which concern other nations, would it not be logical to widen the scope of this treaty and to fulfill that purpose by permitting any nation which may now or hereafter have an interest in the Pacific Ocean to become a party to the treaty and to attend the conferences which may be held to consider and settle such questions? That would accord with American ideals of right and justice.

There would be no impartial conference unless all of the powers which may be concerned are permitted to attend and confer as equals over any questions that may arise. Certainly Holland, Portugal, China, and Russia—when there is a recognized Russian Government—all of whom have vital interests in the Pacific, should be parties to this treaty, and why should Italy have been left out? Italy has no island or mandate in the Pacific, but she might under certain conditions be adversely affected by this pact. She supported, probably more than any other power at the conference, the American views, and it can not but cause some regret in Italy that she was not considered of enough importance to be asked to join in this with the other powers with which she has been associated in war and postwar activities. If a war should come between France and Italy, the latter might have a vital interest in the Pacific, if for no other reason than that of protecting her mercantile marine. If it is not an alliance, there should be no objection to bringing all of these powers in; and if it is an alliance the American people ought to know it and have an opportunity to decide whether or not they want us to adopt the European system of alliances. While there may be a difference of opinion as to the mandate of the American people to enter or stay out of the league, no one claims that they have ever given a mandate to enter an exclusive alliance.

It is difficult to see what objection there could be to inviting all of the nations to join this pact. The answer to this may be that the nations who are to-day members of the League of Nations would be entering into a superfluous agreement, because they have already agreed to confer not only on all questions arising in the Pacific but in any other portion of the world. England, France, and Japan in signing this treaty have, of course, agreed to nothing whatever, except that for which they were already bound as members of the League of Nations, unless it be that it is an alliance meaning more than its advocates contend and that article 2 of the four-power treaty is more binding upon them than article 10 of the covenant of the League of Nations.

Many of the islands in the Pacific the title and possession of which are in effect guaranteed by us and the other parties to this four-power treaty are trust estates over which the League of Nations exercises jurisdiction. England, France, and Japan, as members of the League of Nations, are obligated to file this treaty with the league before it is binding on them. Was it advisable for us, without even a request from the league, to give this guaranty? If we wish to assist the league, is that the best way to do it?

Statesmen have been particularly concerned about two outstanding situations which were disturbing the economic and political equilibrium of the world. I refer to conditions in Europe and the Far East, which have been created more particularly by the state of mind and political policies of two nations, France and Japan, respectively. As heretofore indicated, the difficulties in the Far East which the Washington conference endeavored to solve were due primarily to Japanese activities to which other nations, and especially the United States, were opposed, and to the fear on the part of Japan that force might be employed to stop them. The situation referred to in Europe has grown out of the war. The principal obstacle to a restoration of confidence and stability as well as to a reduction in armies is due to the French policy of taking measures to secure dominance in Europe and so prevent another invasion by Germany. The settlements in the Far East may all be upset unless Europe is straightened out. It is apparent that without some measure of assurance against aggression France can not be persuaded to disarm and contribute her share toward the restoration of Europe's equilibrium. We refuse to give any guaranty to France or, better still, to enter the League of Nations and make it such a factor that France would not require further assurance, but we have asked France to join with us in the four-power treaty to guarantee peace in the Pacific and tranquillity to Japan.

In so far as concerns the participation of any one nation in international affairs, there have been up to now only three distinct policies advocated or followed:

First. That of so-called isolation—the refusal to enter into offensive or defensive alliances or to act in concert with the other powers for the settlement of international controversies.

Second. The European system of alliances or so-called "balance of power." This means agreements between certain groups of nations to act in concert, usually against certain other groups of powers.

Third. Cooperation between all of the powers.

The policy of isolation has under modern conditions become impossible and has now been definitely discarded by the present administration.

In spite of the fact that Europe is strewn with wrecks caused by alliances, wrecks which a "balance of power" has not prevented, there are still those who cling to this forlorn hope. While the alliances composed of a certain group of powers have always been alleged as defensive, they are primarily intended to prevent other powers, composing another group, from interfering with alleged rights and interests. Controversial questions between the respective groups are not thus composed. The result has been ex parte arrangements and continued misunderstandings which have resulted ultimately in armed conflict. While we must admit that through this system the recurrence of war may have been retarded, yet when a war has come it has been impossible to localize it because so many powers are involved that it becomes a world war.

The third policy of cooperation is based upon the recognition of the failure of the two former policies. The first practical attempt to adopt this latter plan was through the creation of the League of Nations, one of the principal objects of which was to disentangle alliances by bringing all the powers together in an agreement to settle their controversies by peaceful adjustments rather than by force. This was also the first serious attempt made to bring the nations together to work in concert purely and solely in the interests of peace and equity.

I believe in the plan for universal conference and cooperation, because the world has become too interdependent to function harmoniously without it and because it is the only method offered whereby we may cooperate without becoming entangled by alliances.

I also believe in it because of the practical possibilities which it offers, because there would seem to be no harm in trying it, and because it certainly could not play any more havoc than has the system of alliances.

If there were some other means whereby alliances could be done away with and prevented, there would not be so much necessity for an association of nations, but how can this be accomplished unless all of the nations enter into an agreement to that effect and substitute more enlightened methods for adjusting differences and preventing conflicts?

America's first actual contact with the old system of alliance was when it brought us into the World War. Our second contact was with the Anglo-Japanese alliance, which we found to be quite an obstacle to just and peaceful settlements in the Far East. It is therefore well for us to know now whether we are rid of this obstruction or have increased its size by becoming part of it. Alliances or special agreements between certain groups of nations arouse suspicions and militate against cooperation. The existence of the Anglo-Japanese alliance made it difficult to fix a naval ratio. It is equally certain that any subsequent alliance between one of the powers parties to the new naval treaty will upset the respective ratio of naval strength now fixed. It would therefore have been wise to prohibit any party to this treaty from making an alliance or agreement with one or more of the other members, which, since such an agreement would upset the ratio fixed, might ultimately involve joint naval action against any one of the other parties to the treaty.

It is to be presumed that those who have negotiated the various agreements in Washington will make very clear to us just which of the three above-mentioned plans they propose to follow. If the steps taken, with a view to maintaining harmony in the Pacific Ocean and the Far East, are part of a general plan to eliminate conflict in other portions of the world, it is difficult to form an intelligent opinion regarding one phase of a comprehensive plan without knowing what the entire plan is and how it will be applied to other regions of the world. If an attempt is to be made to segregate the world's problems into different compartments, would it not be well to know just what relation one compartment is to have to another? If the Far East is to be put in one compartment, the Near East in one, Europe in another, and South America in another, will it not be necessary to define how the relations between different compartments are to be maintained? How many of these groups are we going to join? Is any other power to be in them all? If a nation joins more than one, to what extent will it be a free agent, and to which group will it owe most allegiance?

Surely this last war has taught us that conflicts which seem purely local and of no interest to the outside world may spread until they involve all of the powers. It is now generally admitted that some sort of international cooperation is necessary. The world has become too interdependent and interrelated to deal with its problems in separate compartments. What happens in one section affects another, and there can be no appreciable advance toward peace and prosperity until the problems are dealt with as a whole.

This last war, which involved the whole world, including the United States, grew out of issues primarily European, with which we were not supposed to be at all concerned. After that experience, how is it possible to believe that questions in the Pacific Ocean merely concern the United States, Japan, England, and France?

It may be argued that this four-power treaty would be different from former or other existing alliances. That, it seems, is difficult to substantiate by existing facts. It had about the same kind of birth. The moral rights of other nations equally interested in the Pacific were ignored at the outset by not being invited to join it. Any alliance composed of powerful nations which ignores or violates the rights and claims of weaker nations would be repugnant to the fundamental and historical American principles of freedom, equality, and justice. Alliances or special agreements between a certain group of nations either originate from moral or material objectives not in harmony with those of other nations or inevitably develop them.

Some doubt about the four-power treaty could be cleared up by a simple provision to the effect that no ex parte conferences will be held to consider questions relating to the Pacific Ocean; that any and all powers which now have or may hereafter have an interest in the Pacific will be invited to become parties to the treaty; that its maintenance shall be contingent upon the due and proper adherence by each party to the principle embodied in the treaty on Chinese integrity and applied also to Siberia; and that the creation of any treaty, alliance, or diplomatic agreement in future between any two or more signatories to the four-power treaty to which the other signatory powers are not parties shall be cause for reconsideration or renunciation (by those omitted) of the four-power treaty itself. We have learned from experience that even a diplomatic agreement between two powers relating to a particular territory or question invariably results in their acting in concert on questions outside the scope of their agreement.

Some of my friends, including Republicans, with whom I have discussed this treaty have, in spite of certain misgivings about it, expressed the hope that this, together with the other agreements, will ultimately lead us into the League of Nations or some similar association of nations.

I am convinced that the four-power pact will not only diminish the benefits to be derived from those other agreements, but that as it stands it will lead us in the opposite direction and into the European system of alliances, which will make it more difficult if not impossible thereafter to enter the existing league or any other genuine association of nations.

Unless this danger is avoided and unless we get started on the right course now, we will soon find ourselves entangled in a chain of alliances covering different parts of the globe; the four-power treaty or alliance in the Pacific; the Anglo-French alliance, the Anglo-Belgian alliance, and the Franco-Belgian alliance against Germany; the Franco-Polish alliance against Germany; possibly a Franco-Rumanian-Hungarian alliance; a Balkan alliance; and then a German-Russian alliance. When all of these alliances get to working for the peace of the world we may well imagine how beautiful are the future prospects for peace.

ACQUISITION OF REAL ESTATE BY THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7158) to amend the Army appropriation act approved July 11, 1919, so as to release appropriations for the completion of the acquisition of real estate in certain cases, and making additional appropriations therefor, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. NEW, Mr. SPENCER, and Mr. MYERS conferees on the part of the Senate.

CAMP HENRY KNOX, KY.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2072) entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of War to make and receive conveyances effecting an exchange of title to the railroad rights of way at Camp Henry Knox, Ky., and for other purposes," which was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to execute and deliver a conveyance of title to the Chicago, St. Louis & New Orleans Railroad Co. to that certain strip of land in the military reservation at Camp Knox, Ky., upon which the line of said railroad was relocated and the new depots and transportation structures were erected at Camp Knox, described as follows: Beginning at the point of intersection of the present westerly right of way line of the Chicago, St. Louis & New Orleans Railroad Co. with the southerly line of a highway which crosses said railroad under Bridge J-29-8, said point being 780 feet northerly from milepost 30 from Louisville, Ky., and running thence westerly along said southerly line 17 feet more or less to a point 50 feet distant westerly from the center line of the main track of said railroad measured at a right angle thereto; thence southerly parallel to the center line of the relocated main track of said railroad and 50 feet westerly therefrom, a distance of 780 feet to a point opposite milepost 30 from Louisville; thence westerly perpendicular to said relocated main track 90 feet; thence southerly parallel to said main track 1,701 feet more or less to the northerly line of the highway which crosses said railroad under Bridge J-30-3; thence easterly along the line of said highway 50 feet more or less to a point which is 90 feet distant westerly from the center line of the aforesaid relocated main track measured perpendicularly thereto; thence southerly in a direct line 964 feet to a point which is 50 feet distant westerly from the center line of said relocated track; thence southerly parallel to the center line of said relocated track and 50 feet distant therefrom, 4,457 feet more or less to a point in the westerly line of the present right of way of said railroad about 1,800 feet southerly from milepost 31 from Louisville, Ky.; thence northerly along the westerly line of the present right of way of said railroad 610 feet more or less to a point 50 feet distant easterly from the center line of said relocated main track measured perpendicularly thereto; thence northerly parallel to said center line 3,700 feet; thence easterly at a right angle to said line 50 feet; thence northerly parallel to said center line and 100 feet distant therefrom 1,125 feet; thence westerly perpendicular to said center line 25 feet; thence northerly parallel to said center line 1,861 feet more or less to a point in the westerly line of the present right of way of said railroad; thence northerly along said right-of-way line 655 feet more or less to the point of beginning; reserving to the Government the perpetual right to use and have kept open the underpasses now in use under and across said railroad.

Sec. 2. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to receive, on behalf of the United States, deed or deeds of conveyance, with covenants of general warranty, and release from the mortgage obligations of said railroad company to the old right of way of said company, described as follows: All that part of the original right of way of the Chicago, St. Louis & New Orleans Railroad Co. which lies south of a line drawn parallel to the center line of the relocated main track of said railroad, and 50 feet distant easterly from said center line, measured perpendicularly thereto, near milepost 30 from Louisville, Ky., and north of a line drawn parallel to said relocated main track, and 50 feet distant easterly from the center line thereof, near a point about 1,600 feet southerly from milepost 31 from Louisville, Ky., said original right of way herein conveyed, consisting of a strip of land 66 feet wide and approximately 7,200 feet long, and also a tract of land 375 feet long, 77 feet wide at the southerly end, 23 feet at the northerly end, lying on the easterly side of the aforesaid 66-foot strip, and containing eighty-five one-hundredths of an acre, more or less, and being the tract of land acquired by the railroad company from P. A. Jones and wife, recorded in book 20, page 59, in the deed records of Hardin County, Ky.

Sec. 3. That the description of the metes and bounds of said property above stated shall be inserted in said conveyances, and in addition thereto proper specifications and reference to the next immediate source from which the grantors therein derived title thereto as required by the statute of Kentucky on the subject of recording conveyances of real estate in that State, as set forth in Carroll Statutes, 1915, volume 1, section 495.

Sec. 4. That all laws in conflict herewith be, and they are hereby, repealed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I am about to move that the Senate concur in the House amendment, with a very brief statement in explanation.

The Senate passed some little time ago this bill providing for this exchange of lands, made necessary by the moving of a certain railroad right of way around the edge of this Government reservation instead of going through it, as it formerly did. The bill as amended by the House accomplishes exactly the same result. They have made some change in language and have described the property by metes and bounds with great particularity, which the original Senate bill did not do. There being no change in the essential features of the bill, I move that the Senate concur in the House amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator if the amendment accomplishes the same purpose that the Senate bill originally was intended to accomplish?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Exactly; and the amendment meets the approval of the United States Railroad Administration, which was much concerned about this matter, the War Department, and the owners of the property.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The amendment was concurred in.

OPERATION OF GOVERNMENT-OWNED RADIO STATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 7) to amend section 2 of the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution to authorize the operation of Government-owned radio stations for the use of the general public, and for other purposes," approved June 5, 1920, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and grant the request of the House for a conference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. PAGE, Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. HALE, Mr. SWANSON, and Mr. PITTMAN conferees on the part of the Senate.

AFFAIRS IN HAITI.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 243) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be, and he hereby is, respectfully requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to transmit to the Senate a copy of any order, commission, or other authorization issued by him or under his direction to Brig. Gen. John H. Russell authorizing him to act for or on behalf of the Government of the United States in Haiti, with a copy of any instructions which may have been given him touching the discharge of his duties therein; or if such order, commission, or authorization, or such instructions, were given orally and not in writing, to advise the Senate touching the same.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Anticipating no opposition, I ask for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

WORLD WAR FOREIGN DEBT COMMISSION.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I submit a resolution and ask that it be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 244) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and it hereby is, directed to inquire into and report to the Senate not later than Tuesday next (Feb. 28, 1922), touching the eligibility of Hon. REED SMOOT and Hon. THEODORE E. BURTON to membership on the commission created by the act of Congress approved February 9, 1922, entitled "An act to create a commission authorized to refund or convert obligations of foreign Governments held by the United States of America, and for other purposes," reference being made to section 6 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States, as follows:

"No Senator or Representative shall during the time for which he was elected be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States which shall have been created or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In the regular course of procedure the nominations to which the resolution refers would receive consideration at the next executive session of the Senate. In view of that fact, I hope to address the Senate some time during the day on the subject matter of the resolution. I am not prepared to do so at this hour.

I take this course because of the very distinguished precedent for it. Some years ago, when Members of this body were appointed to a commission, the then distinguished Senator from the State of Massachusetts, Mr. Hoar, questioned both the legality and the wisdom of appointments of that character, and upon his suggestion the Committee on the Judiciary was directed by the Senate to inquire into the matter. I have not yet been able to follow the matter to its ultimate result, but it is my understanding now that the Committee on the Judiciary made no formal report. The matter is of such very grave moment that it seems to me that committee, created for the purpose of considering questions of this character, ought to be given an opportunity to investigate it and report to the Senate before action is taken.

Mr. LODGE. I only want to suggest that if prompt action is not taken, and the confirmation of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and Mr. BURTON of the House is to be held up until the committee reports, it will, of course, arrest all the proceedings of the commission.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is a matter for the Senate to determine. The Senate may go on and confirm or reject these nominations without adequate investigation into the important question which is now raised, if it sees fit to do so. I shall be very glad to amend the resolution so as to require the committee to report not later than next Monday.

Mr. LODGE. That will be satisfactory to me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the modification.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Add at the end of the resolution the following words:

And that the said Committee on the Judiciary be directed to report to the Senate not later than Monday next.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I suggest to make it Tuesday, if the Senator from Massachusetts will consent to that.

Mr. LODGE. Not later than Tuesday of next week.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I ask that the resolution may lie on the table until to-morrow morning, and I shall endeavor to address the Senate during this afternoon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be printed and lie on the table.

PROPOSED LOAN TO HAITI.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, on the legislative day of the 3d instant, the calendar day of the 6th, I offered a resolution, and I challenge attention to it now because of the important resolution just offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. The resolution which he offered asks for certain information relative to the appointment of Brig. Gen. Russell to a very important position in the island of Haiti. The resolution (S. Res. 233) which I offered reads as follows:

Whereas the United States, through its naval forces and officials acting under the direction of the State Department, is in control of Haiti and the Haitian Government; and

Whereas it is proposed that a loan of $14,000,000 be negotiated in behalf of Haiti, to be paid by the Haitian people; and

Whereas such a loan is not desired by the Haitian people and is believed by them to be unwarranted and illegal and contrary to the best interests economically and politically of Haiti and her people: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate by what authority such proposed loan is being negotiated, together with the terms and conditions thereof and the reasons therefor.

Resolved further, That no debt should be created by the United States or by persons representing it which would be a charge upon Haiti or the Haitian people or the Haitian Government.

I will ask the adoption of the resolution, first striking out the third "whereas" and the last "resolve," so that it will read as I ask its adoption:

Whereas the United States, through its naval forces and officials acting under the direction of the State Department, is in control of Haiti and the Haitian Government; and

Whereas it is proposed that a loan of $14,000,000 be negotiated in behalf of Haiti, to be paid by the Haitian people: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate by what authority such proposed loan is being negotiated, together with the terms and conditions thereof and the reasons therefor.

Mr. LODGE. With that amendment, I have no objection to it.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, has this matter been before the Committee on Foreign Relations?

Mr. KING. No.

Mr. POMERENE. I see no reason why the resolution should not pursue the regular course, and go to the committee for inquiry and report. I do not care to discuss Haitian matters to-day, nor the affairs of Santo Domingo. I happen to be a member of the committee which has been making an investigation into the affairs on those islands. I do not have complete knowledge on that subject, and no member of the committee will claim to have complete knowledge on the subject. We have not yet completed our hearings.

I simply want at this time to suggest that if Senators are going to come to a conclusion based upon statements which are made by a very few people, some of whom are Haitians and Dominicans, and a few of whom are Americans, they will be sadly led astray.

This is a matter of a good deal of importance. No one wants to impose a loan if it is not a proper thing, but how anyone can come here and speak for the Haitian people, in view of conditions as they exist there now, is beyond my comprehension. I can understand how a few American politicians, who get in touch with a few Haitian or Dominican politicians, can speak the expressed views of those politicians, if they do not present the actual views of those politicians.

The conditions in Haiti and Santo Domingo touch me very much, and I think the special committee investigating those conditions has at heart the interests of those people just as much as the few politicians who pretend to speak for those people. I do not want this statement to be misunderstood. I have no criticism to offer of those Senators or other people who want full knowledge; they are entitled to that; but it does seem to me that under the circumstances this resolution should go to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and pursue the usual course.

The chairman of the special committee which has had charge of this investigation is out of the city now, I understand. He likewise is a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I may say, without any reflection upon the other members of the special committee, that he perhaps is more familiar with the details of conditions there than any of the rest of us; and I should certainly want his view with regard to it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, after the statement of the Senator from Ohio, I hope the Senator from Utah will be willing to allow the resolution to go to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. KING. Just one word, Mr. President.

I accept with due humility the castigation which has just been administered by the Senator from Ohio. I am sure the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] must feel as I do, greatly perturbed, because the Senator from Montana has had the temerity to ask for certain information relative to a most extraordinary proceeding upon the part of the State Department in sending an officer to Haiti clothed with plenary authority—military, administrative, civil, and political. I was glad the Senator from Montana asked for the reasons for such an extraordinary commission being given to an American officer.

I have asked for information as to the reason why a loan of $14,000,000 is being negotiated by the State Department for Haiti. I can not conceive that there is anything improper in offering such a resolution, or that it is evidence that the man so seeking that information is a politician. I deny the right of the American Government to superimpose its will upon any people, an alien race. If a loan is to be imposed upon the people of Haiti of $14,000,000, they ought to have something to say in regard to it, and if we are to impose the loan upon them, there is certainly no reason why the Department of State should not furnish the reason for the loan and the terms of the loan.

I want to know the facts in regard to that. The Senator from Ohio, if he wants to debate that question here and now, or at any other time, will be accommodated.

I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution is now on the table.

Mr. KING. I ask that it be taken from the table and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I was especially careful to suggest, at the conclusion of my remarks, that I made no reflection upon the Senator from Utah. I had reference to certain other individuals, and I have no apology to make. I usually speak the English tongue when I do speak, and at the proper time I shall discuss this matter fully, but I think it will be after the special committee shall have concluded its hearings.

TREATY WITH JAPAN.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business in open executive session, the subject being the treaty between the United States and Japan.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I presented a resolution on yesterday afternoon for an investigation of the Federal reserve bank at Atlanta, and under the rule it went over until this morning. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will not press his motion until we can get that resolution to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. It ought to go to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. OVERMAN. It has to go first to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; it must first go to that committee.

Mr. LODGE. I have no objection to its going to the proper committee.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire whether that means the adoption of the resolution?

Mr. HEFLIN. No; it will have to be reported back from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate and then its course will be determined by the Senate.

Mr. KING. I desire, when the resolution is formally before the Senate, to offer a substitute for it.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator can do that when it is before the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I must insist on my motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business in open executive session.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty between the United States and Japan with regard to the rights of the two Governments and their respective nationals in the former German islands in the Pacific Ocean lying north of the Equator, in particular the island of Yap, signed at Washington on February 11, 1922.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me for a minute.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As I understand it, the Senator from Massachusetts gave notice yesterday evening that he would call up the treaty after the disposition of morning business. The proposal of my colleague to have the resolution referred to the appropriate committee is morning business.

Mr. LODGE. I have no objection and said so, but apparently it was going to lead to a great deal of debate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, the substitute of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] would not be in order until the reference had been made and the resolution reported back to the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. I have no objection to the reference being made.

Mr. HEFLIN. I ask to have the resolution referred, then.

Mr. KELLOGG. To what committee?

Mr. HEFLIN. To the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

FEDERAL RESERVE BANK AT ATLANTA.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from the previous day, which will be read.

The Assistant Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 242) submitted yesterday by Mr. HEFLIN, as follows:

Whereas it is alleged that the officials of the Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta have been and are mailing out literature and speeches of a political nature designed to influence public opinion and injuriously affect the standing and service of a United States Senator; and

Whereas it is alleged that said officers are paying for the distribution of said literature and speeches out of the funds of said Federal reserve bank, in violation of law; and

Whereas the Senate would regard with keen disapproval the attempt on the part of any one of the Federal reserve banks to use its power to influence or coerce politically any banker or anyone else in its district; and

Whereas Congress in creating the Federal reserve banking system desired and intended that it should at all times be kept free from political activities; and

Whereas such activities of officers of the said Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta are alleged to be the result of the suggestion of the Federal Reserve Board, or some member thereof, and are contrary to law and sound public policy: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Chair shall appoint five Senators, who shall constitute a committee to investigate said actions of said board and bank and report to the Senate their findings thereon and recommendations touching said alleged actions and political activities.

Resolved further, That said committee shall have power to send for persons, papers, and books, to administer oaths and take testimony, to employ a stenographer and pay for his services at not more than $1.25 per printed page of said testimony; and all costs accruing hereunder shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by said committee.

Mr. HEFLIN. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, on that question I should like to be recognized.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I yielded with the understanding that the resolution was simply to be referred. If it is going to lead to protracted debate I must say that I do not think it is morning business under the ruling of the former Vice President. I always used to think it was until he ruled to the contrary.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is in the line of morning business. It seems to me clear under the rules of the Senate that it is a class of business which is in order during the morning hour.

Mr. LODGE. It is in order to make a motion to take it up.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The rules of the Senate require that a resolution of this kind shall go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Undoubtedly, and I did not suppose there would be any objection to that reference.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There can not be any question that the junior Senator from Alabama is entitled to have his resolution go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. When it comes back to the Senate, if Senators desire to move to refer it to some other committee, they can do so at that time.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state the inquiry.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think it is a United States statute which requires a resolution involving the expenditure of money from the contingent fund to be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, but is there any rule of the Senate which requires it to be referred to that committee before it is referred, for instance, as in this case, to the Committee on Banking and Currency on the merits?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; that has to be done as the first step.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no rule of that kind.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. As I have stated previously, it would seem to me to be the logical way for the Senate to determine whether it is going to make an investigation before it decides whether to appropriate money for it.

Mr. LODGE. That is the way it is usually done.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I had always supposed that it would be much better. If the Senate decides not to make the investigation, there is no use of referring the resolution to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I suggest to my friend from Connecticut that logically the situation is just as well one way as the other. If the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate make up their minds that they will not allow the money to be spent for the investigation, there is no use of the other committee investigating whether it should be done. It is the usual course in the Senate that my colleague is taking in reference to a resolution that is personal to himself, in asking that it be referred to the usual committee to which resolutions of this kind go.

When the question comes before the Senate for consideration on its merits, of course, all these questions are open. If the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate report the resolution back favorably, it will then be in order to move to have it referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. It will then be in order for the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to move his substitute. But the course which my colleague is pursuing, whether it is provided in the rules or not, is the custom and the precedent of the Senate. Whether Senators agree with the resolution or not, every Senator is entitled to have an opportunity for the consideration of his proposal. This is the usual way and I think my colleague is entitled to have it followed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, I admit the resolution must go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate at some time. I merely desired to inquire whether it was a rule of the Senate or not.

Mr. LODGE. It has been done both ways.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is customary to have it done this way, and the Senator in charge of the resolution usually has the privilege of having it referred the first time where he desires to have it go.

Mr. EDGE. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. EDGE. In the absence of the chairman, the Committee on Banking and Currency, of which I am a member—I am speaking on the subject of the resolution—it seems to me that the committee charged with the responsibility of banking and currency matters should first consider the subject matter of the proposed resolution before a general committee charged with the responsibility of furnishing funds for all activities considers the advisability of furnishing the funds.

While I understand the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] that either order has prevailed at different times, I think the businesslike order would be for the committee intrusted with the responsibility of banking and currency legislation first to consider the charges made and the foundation for them, and if in their judgment the investigation is warranted they would so report. Then the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate would consider the expense feature of the resolution. For that reason I intended to suggest that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. My attitude in the matter is this. I am not making the suggestion simply because my colleague has offered the resolution, but it is customary in the case of a resolution of inquiry or a resolution of investigation, especially where the matter is personal to the Senator himself, to allow him to name the committee to which it shall be referred. It is entirely within the precedents of the Senate to refer such a resolution to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Whether Senators are in favor of the resolution or not, I hope because some Senators may think the resolution should not be passed they will not attempt to establish a precedent and delay the action and a proper reference of this kind in this exceptional case when it is customary across the aisle that lies between us to allow such resolutions to go as a matter of comity every day.

I think if my colleague, the junior Senator from Alabama, desires to have this reference he is entitled to it. If the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate fail to report the resolution, he must take his chance. If it comes back to the Senate, of course it can not be finally acted on before a motion to refer is made, so nobody can lose any rights.

Mr. EDGE. I am not discussing the merits of the resolution at all, because I know absolutely nothing about it, but it would seem to me the Senator from Alabama would prefer on second thought to press his charges before the Banking and Currency Committee and the consideration of the resolution there than before the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. I can not, of course, speak for him, but that would seem to me to be the natural course.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from New Jersey that the resolution states that a certain amount and no more shall be paid for stenographic work, and the idea is that the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate will approve or disapprove that feature of it and say that the committee can or can not take care of the expenses proposed to be incurred. That is the purpose.

The Presiding Officer on yesterday, the President pro tem [Mr. CUMMINS], told me that my resolution would have to go to the committee to which I have asked to have it sent. That is the reason why I asked this morning that it go there first. When it comes back to the Senate the Senate can then refer it where it chooses to refer it, but it must be looked into first, as I understand it, by the committee which audits and controls the contingent funds of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Sooner or later that must be done.

Mr. FLETCHER. Rule XXV of the Senate provides for—

A Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to consist of five Senators, to which shall be referred all resolutions directing the payment of money out of the contingent fund of the Senate or creating a charge upon the same.

Mr. LODGE. All they have to determine is whether there is money in the Treasury with which to pay the bill. They have no right to pass on the merits of the resolution.

Mr. FLETCHER. No; but such resolutions have to go to that committee.

Mr. LODGE. And the question of the investigation will have to go to another committee.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. What is the motion now pending, or is there a motion pending?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending motion is to refer the resolution to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. EDGE. I move to amend that motion that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. LODGE. That can not be done.

Mr. EDGE. Then if the motion of the Senator from Alabama is defeated, I will move to refer the resolution to the Committee on Banking and Currency, where I think it properly belongs.

Mr. KING. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. KING. I do not want the statement made by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] to go unchallenged, namely, that the rule requires or compels the reference of all resolutions first to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. We had that matter under consideration recently when a resolution was offered for an investigation, and after some discussion the resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. After they reported that the investigation should be had, the resolution came back to the Senate and then it was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. FLETCHER. I did not say that the rules require that it shall first be referred to that committee, but it has to go there.

Mr. KING. Oh, undoubtedly; sooner or later.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think it should go there first.

Mr. HEFLIN. That is what the Presiding Officer told me yesterday was the course to pursue.

Mr. LODGE. Let it go there, then.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Assistant Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gerry	McLean	Smith
Ball	Glass	McNary	Smoot
Borah	Gooding	Moses	Spencer
Brandegee	Harrell	Nelson	Stanfield
Bursum	Harris	New	Townsend
Calder	Harrison	Newberry	Trammell
Cameron	Hefflin	Nicholson	Underwood
Capper	Johnson	Oddie	Wadsworth
Caraway	Jones, N. Mex.	Overman	Walsh, Mass.
Colt	Jones, Wash.	Page	Walsh, Mont.
Culberson	Kellogg	Philpotts	Warren
Curtis	Kendrick	Pittman	Watson, Ga.
Dillingham	King	Pomerene	Watson, Ind.
Edge	Ladd	Ransdell	Weller
Elkins	Lodge	Robinson	Williams
Fernald	McCumber	Sheppard	Willis
Fletcher	McKellar	Shortridge
France	McKinley	Simmons

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to announce that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] is absent on account of sickness. I also wish to state that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] is necessarily absent from the Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOSES in the chair). Seventy Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the demand seconded?

Mr. HEFLIN. I withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays just now.

Mr. EDGE. I will make the suggestion for the Senator from Alabama, and demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (when the name of Mr. MOSES was called). The present occupant of the chair has a general pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD]. In the absence of that Senator the Chair transfers the pair to the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CROW] and votes "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is necessarily absent, and I have agreed to take care of him during that absence. I find I can transfer my pair with him to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. I make that transfer and vote "nay."

Mr. PHIPPS (after having voted in the negative). On this motion I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PEPPER] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. KENDRICK. I have a general pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "yea."

Mr. EDGE (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] to the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. SMITH (after having voted in the affirmative). I desire to inquire has the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. SMITH. I have a general pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. ERNST] with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY]; and

The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS].

The result was announced—yeas 32, nays 33, as follows:

YEAS—32.

Ashurst	Harris	McNary	Smith
Capper	Harrison	Overman	Stanfield
Caraway	Healin	Pittman	Trammell
Culberson	Jones, N. Mex.	Pomeroy	Underwood
Fletcher	Kendrick	Ransdell	Walsh, Mass.
France	King	Robinson	Walsh, Mont.
Gerry	Ladd	Sheppard	Watson, Ga.
Gooding	McKellar	Simmons	Williams

NAYS—33.

Borah	Fernald	New	Townsend
Brandagee	Harrell	Newberry	Wadsworth
Calder	Jones, Wash.	Nicholson	Warren
Cameron	Kellogg	Oddie	Watson, Ind.
Colt	Lodge	Page	Weller
Curtis	McCumber	Phipps	Willis
Dillingham	McKinley	Shortridge
Edge	McLean	Smoot
Elkins	Moses	Spencer

NOT VOTING—31.

Ball	Frelinghuysen	Lenroot	Poindexter
Broussard	Glass	McCormick	Reed
Bursum	Hale	Myers	Shields
Crow	Hitchcock	Nelson	Stanley
Cummins	Johnson	Norbeck	Sterling
Dial	Kenyon	Norris	Sutherland
du Pont	Keyes	Owen	Swanson
Ernst	La Follette	Pepper

So, Mr. HEFLIN's motion was rejected.

Mr. EDGE. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey to refer Senate resolution 242 to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I wish to say a few words on the motion.

The custom in the Senate has been to refer to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate a resolution which sought an investigation and carried expenditures from the contingent fund of the Senate. On yesterday, when I asked permission to have my resolution considered at once, without its being referred to any committee, I was told by a number of Senators that it was necessary to have it go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. The consideration of the resolution was not permitted at that time. Objection was made to it, I believe, by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES]. Three Republican Senators objected to its present consideration and to making any disposition of it at that time. I afterwards talked with the Presiding Officer, who was the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], and he told me that the resolution would have to go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, that being the first step, to see whether or not that committee, which handles the purse strings of the Senate, is to O. K. the expenditure of money necessary to carry on an investigation, and whether or not it will O. K. the amount set out in the resolution which is to be paid for stenographic work.

I know, and the Senate knows, and the country knows, that unless expenses are provided for there will be no investigation. It was my purpose—and I am going to be frank with the Senate as I am going to be frank with the country in discussing this matter—it was my purpose when this resolution came back from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate to ask for its immediate consideration. There is no use in referring it to any committee for further investigation than that of looking after the expense to be incurred; none in the world. Senators can very easily be acquainted with the situation. I can show by the newspaper reports that the Atlanta bank admits that it has been writing letters and distributing the speech of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], which was made in a debate with me upon the Federal Reserve Board and its administration of the banking system. I shall read that statement a moment later.

What is the necessity for referring this resolution to the Committee on Banking and Currency?

In the first place, the controversy had upon this floor was between myself and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], who is himself a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency. The chairman of that committee is the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], who takes the position that the Senator from Virginia takes, and who congratulated him upon his speech the first day in this discussion with me upon the Federal Reserve Board's deflation policy and its administration, or maladministration, of the Federal reserve banking system. My resolution seeks to have the Senate determine whether one of the great Federal reserve banks in this country shall engage in politics, shall use its power to spread a propaganda in which there are attacks by one Senator upon another, which challenge the position of one Senator and criticize his position through the mouth of another.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HEFLIN. I am glad to yield to my friend from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Directly in line with what the Senator is saying, I will state to him and to the Senate and to the country that months and months ago I introduced a resolution requesting the President to remove Gov. W. P. G. Harding, the man who has done more industrial harm to this country than was done to Belgium and France by the armies of Germany. That resolution has rested in that committee month after month; and I submit to the Senate and to the country that that is not the courteous way to treat a Senator, nor is it a senatorial way to treat a great matter which has been referred to a committee in a proper way. The Senator's resolution will take the same course. It will be chloroformed in the committee room.

Mr. HEFLIN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, this is a vital question. A hundred million people are involved in this matter. Mighty forces are being brought to bear to seal the lips of those of us who dare to challenge in this Chamber the action of the Federal Reserve Board. One Federal reserve bank, serving several States in my section, is using its power, making itself a clearing house for political literature, and circulating at the expense of the bank a speech of one Senator that challenges the position of another Senator, that criticizes the position of another Senator, that belittles the position of another Senator, and is sending that literature into that Senator's State.

Mr. President, the Atlanta Journal, a paper published in that city, got a statement from one of the agents of that bank, in which he says that they have sent that speech not only to the bankers of my State, the member banks of the system, but to the nonmember banks, to merchants, to corporations, and to business people generally, accompanied by a letter telling them of this speech made by the Senator from Virginia and asking them to read it and get a correct view of the situation.

I took the position that his speech was not the correct view of it. I took the position that his speech was full of misinformation. He took the same position with regard to mine. He had a right to take that position; I had a right to take the position that I did with regard to his speech; but what business has a Government bank, holding the purse strings of millions of people in the district that it serves, to use its power to spread its propaganda through the speech of one Senator which attacks, assails, and criticizes the position of another?

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?
Mr. HEFLIN. I am glad to yield to my friend from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator overlooks another part of that letter. There is a questionnaire that goes along with it, and asks the bankers and merchants to commit themselves as to what they got out of the speech after they read it. They want a reply.

Mr. HEFLIN. I am going to send the letter to the desk and ask that it be read in my time. Here it is, published in the Atlanta Journal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama requests that the letter referred to be read from the desk. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

FEBRUARY 7, 1922.

To whom addressed:

During recent months the Federal reserve system has been the subject of much discussion, some of which has evidenced that a thorough understanding of the system's operation does not exist, which is not surprising, as the average person has had no occasion to make a study of finance, except as it relates to his own business efforts.

Hon. CARTER GLASS, Senator of Virginia, one of the framers of the act from which the system took life, recently delivered a speech in the Senate of the United States that presents a clear exposition of what the Federal reserve system can do and has done, a copy of which we inclose. The document has such educational value that, being interested in the national welfare, you will not only enjoy its reading but will obtain information that can not but give you a better understanding of the value of the Federal reserve system to the country and to your own community of which you are a representative citizen. With the latter thought in mind, we are prompted to ask, after reading the document, that you answer the following questions:

Before having read Senator GLASS'S speech what was your opinion of the value of the Federal reserve system to our country?

What is your opinion after reading his presentation?

Do you now have a better understanding of the functions and operation of the Federal reserve system than you had before?

Any other comment you care to make is invited and will be welcomed.

Respectfully,

FEDERAL RESERVE BANK OF ATLANTA.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, that letter tells a banker, business man, merchant, or corporation that by reading that speech he or it will get a clear explanation of the whole system and what it has done. There is a matter of controversy here between the Senator from Virginia and myself as to how that system has been conducted. I challenge the position that he takes. He challenges mine. Here is a bank taking up the speech of a Senator and sending it out. To whom is it sending it? It is sending it to people who must go to that bank for money or die financially. What does that letter suggest to the man who receives it? Read the speech. You will enjoy it. There are several attacks in it upon the junior Senator from your State, who has had the courage to challenge the cruel course of the Federal Reserve Board and its administration of the system for several months past; but you will, we trust, enjoy the attacks made upon the junior Senator from your State.

After you have read those attacks, and you have gotten a clear explanation of the system from a man whose position he challenges, write to me—the man to whom you must go to get money for the merchants of your town and your territory and the farmers of your county and the territory around you, that will enable them to make a crop and live—write to me, and give me your opinion of this thing. Answer this question: What was your opinion of this system before you read the speech that we send to you at the expense of a Government bank? Then give us the opinion you hold after you have read it, and write that opinion back to us.

Oh, Mr. President, was there ever anything of a more coercive nature, a more insidious, mean, sneaking effort to worm a way into the hearts and brains of bankers in the hope of injuring a Senator in his own State?

What was the feeling of the local banker? What thoughts occupied him when he read that letter? They were the same thoughts which came to me in the letter which I read to Senators, portions of which I read again in this connection. This is from the president of a bank in my State:

DEAR SENATOR HEFLIN: A few days ago the Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta sent us a copy of Senator GLASS'S speech on the Federal reserve system and asked that we read it in order to get a correct idea of the way in which the system had been administered and to write them what we thought about the speech.

We wrote them, of course, that we thought that you and the Manufacturers' Record were nearer right than Senator GLASS in this controversy, but it has occurred to the writer that the Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta really has no business sending out to your constituents the speech of any Senator or Representative in Congress at the expense for printing letters and postage of the Atlanta bank.

It occurs to me that the Atlanta bank is now doing what it can to bring you into disfavor with your constituents because you have had the temerity to discuss the mistakes of the members of the Federal Reserve Board and the officers of the several banks.

Of course, I do not want to get mixed up in politics in any way, and only write you this because my sympathies in this matter are with you and to put you on your guard.

That is the feeling, I believe, which came to the bankers generally, Mr. President, when they received that letter. How would the average banker feel? The first thought which comes into his head is something to this effect, "I now owe that bank in Atlanta money on account of loans. I have to go to that bank again in a few days for more accommodation, and I have received from that bank a speech which attacks a Senator whom I voted to elect to represent me in the United States Senate, as well as to represent the other people in this State, and a letter accompanies it asking me to give the bank in Atlanta my opinion of the speech, and the effort is made to have me express a favorable opinion of it."

Mr. President, those questions in substance say this to the man:

You write us, if you were against the system before, whether you are against it now. Write us whether you agree with Senator HEFLIN or whether you agree with Senator GLASS.

Then what thought comes to him? He says, "Here I am, a free man in what is supposed to be a free country, called upon by a bank designated under the law to serve us with funds which are necessary to carry on the business of our section, and they are asking me a question which I must answer. If I answer it as they want me to answer it, I must repudiate the stand of a man whose course I indorse. If I write them that I do not approve of the speech, but do agree with Senator HEFLIN, then they will tell me that they can not grant my request."

In a statement from a man who had to do with sending out that speech and letter, he said that they sent the speech and letter to all the States of that section. Is that not in violation of the law? Do Senators indorse that sort of thing? I did not know those speeches were being printed by the Federal Reserve Board or the Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta. I did not know they were taking up the speech which had been made by a man who assailed my position and sending it out all over that section. I do not object to any man assailing my position. All I ask is to have him assail me in the open, where I can know what he says about me.

But they took that speech and printed it and sent it out, and when the bankers of my State commenced to complain among each other and write and notify me of what was going on, they said, "Yes; we have sent them not only into Alabama but into Georgia and Louisiana," and two or three other States down there which that bank is intended to serve.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HEFLIN. I am glad to yield to my friend from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, in that connection let me tell the Senator from Alabama that a Member of the Georgia delegation in the other House made a speech over there on the same line the Senator from Alabama has been taking, and the next day he received from Mr. Platt, of the Federal Reserve Board, the most insolent letter I ever read.

Mr. HEFLIN. I agree with the Senator in his opinion of the letter. I have read it.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. It was a threatening letter, and there must have been something sent out into Georgia about it, because this Congressman told me a short while afterwards that he had received a letter from his son-in-law, who is a clerk in a country bank down there, in which his son-in-law begged him for God's sake not to make another attack upon the Federal Reserve Board, for if he did he would lose his job.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I recall the incident mentioned by the Senator from Georgia. I recall the letter written by Mr. Platt, a Republican, a member of the Federal Reserve Board. He was a Member of the House when they got that high rediscount rate through the House. He engineered it; he was chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency in the House, and then later went on the Federal Reserve Board. He wrote to Congressman BRAND that he had better stop or he would hear from it before the primary. That is the substance of it. Let Senators read the letter and see whether I am correct or not. What is that? That is a threat to muzzle men who come here to represent the people back home.

Senators, are we going to submit to this? Are we going to have it said of us by those who write the history of this time, when we are gone, that we betrayed our trust, that we truckled to special interests, that we tied up the instrumentalities of this Government and made the people a prey to those who wanted to suck their life's blood? Do Senators want to be guilty of that?

I want to comment on the incident mentioned by the Senator from Georgia. He told me about that, and it went home to my heart. Think of that, a Representative in the other House criticizing this deflation policy of the Federal Reserve Board, deflation such as was denounced by Lincoln as a crime, and a member of the Federal Reserve Board taking him to task and threatening him politically.

Then follow it on. Certain influences are set to work down there in the reach of this Federal reserve bank, just as they started this move against me, and you find the son-in-law of a Member of Congress [Mr. BRAND] writing his father-in-law that unless he holds up in his criticism of the Federal Reserve Board and its policy, which wrought ruin in that State and in the South and West, it had been whispered to him that he would lose his job. Congressman BRAND is standing by his guns.

If the French soldiers who died at Verdun could have been reached like that the German Army would have been in Paris long, long ago, but there were men at that place feeding themselves into death as rapidly as the destructive engines of war could play upon them from the German Army, and they never surrendered; they never faltered; they never violated their trust; they held that place, saying all the while, "They shall not pass!" Are we going to be less courageous than they? I realize that this is a great power, and I realize that when it is used for good it is a blessing to the country, but I realize that when it gets into politics it is going to be a destructive monster, breaking the morale and courage of men because they are dependent upon it for their money supply to carry on their business.

This is a dangerous thing they are doing. We are bringing the facts before the Senate, and we are calling them to the attention of the Senate. I do not know whether the Senators on the other side are going to permit this investigation or not.

The boys who sent out the first report of my statement in regard to this misunderstood my position. Their report said, "Senator HEFLIN accuses the bank of Atlanta of writing letters to bankers in his State accompanying a speech of the Senator from Virginia," and telling those bankers to write to me to lay off the Federal Reserve Board, to desist in my criticism of that board. I never said anything of the sort. I said they sent out that speech, and that they sent a letter with it calling on the bankers to read it, and asking the bankers to write back to them and tell them what they thought about the speech, and I was not to be notified at all; oh, no. They never suggested that I be told anything about it. They never suggested that anybody write me. They may have intended that it should have that effect, and that people would write me and say to me to desist.

If they did write to me it would be a confidential letter somewhat along this line:

"DEAR SENATOR: I agree with all you say. I know how that policy wrought ruin in this section. I know how it worked ruin in this community, and I know you are right. I agree with you that the deflation policy cost Alabama more than a hundred million dollars, and while this is true (do not use my name) I have been requested to ask you to let up on them, and those who made the request hold the purse strings of the money supply of this section and the situation is embarrassing to me. Is this any longer a free country?"

No official of a Government bank has the right to try to influence the political opinions of any banker in my State or any other State.

We have a great many courageous bankers in this country; and I want to tell Senators another thing. I resent the charge that Gov. Harding has made that the bankers of my State and other States "passed the buck" to the Federal Reserve Board. I believe that the bankers of my State did everything in their power to aid the farmers and the merchants in 1920, but when they were tied up with loans, and this deflation policy broke in all its fury, they could not get the money necessary to meet the needs of their communities, and disaster and distress and acute human suffering came upon our people. I personally know that some of those banks made every effort to get money to loan on cotton to help the farmer keep it off the market until the price would yield a profit. The banks were told that money could not be had to hold cotton.

Mr. CARAWAY. Does the Senator believe that a single Senator on the other side who voted to keep the Senator from Alabama from getting the investigation—for that is what their votes meant—would have voted as he did if the resolution had been aimed at an investigation of the activities of a Democratic bank against some Republican Senator standing for reelection?

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not.

Mr. CARAWAY. Does the Senator think they would have smothered an investigation in an instance similar to this?

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not.

Mr. CARAWAY. I do not, either.

Mr. HEFLIN. That is the reason why I said I was going to indulge in plain talk, and as long as I hold a commission in this body I am going to do it. The faculties that God Almighty has given me were to be used for the best purpose possible, and when I went into the House in 1904 I dedicated myself before God to the service. I registered a vow again when I came to this body to do everything in my power to make a useful and a faithful Senator representing the people of my State. Are efforts to be made to muzzle me, to silence me, to prevent me from speaking what I believe is the truth, from fighting for what I know is the right?

I wish to read what Mr. Lincoln said about deflation, and I am in mighty good company when I am with him. When they asked him, "What is your concrete doctrine in a nutshell?" he is the man who said, "I am in favor of placing the man above the dollar." What did he mean by that? Dollars are useful. We have to have dollars to carry on business. As I said the other day, the dollar is a medium of exchange and a measure of value, but Lincoln wanted the idea always to be uppermost that a human being made in God's image was to be exalted and kept above the doctrine that suggested the worship of the dollar.

What did Lincoln say about deflation?

Here is what he said:

I warn the American people not to permit a repetition of the crimes of history. Following great periods of inflation, if drastic artificial deflation is attempted, disastrous results must follow. I warn them not to permit the money power—

Listen, Senators! What am I talking about to-day? The money power, the ill use of that power, the abuses of those in charge of that power.

I warn them—

Mr. Lincoln said—

not to permit the money power to take advantage of the condition of the people.

What was the condition of the people in this instance dependent for their money upon this system? Who was it that locked the door in their faces and would not let them have it? Who was it deflated and destroyed their property values and made them dump their produce upon the market, and pay with deflated products debts incurred under an inflated policy? Listen further to what Lincoln said:

I warn them not to permit high and usurious interest rates.

What did they do under this progressive interest rate? They charged 10 per cent, 20 per cent, 40 per cent, 50 per cent, 60, 70, 80 per cent, and a little bank in my State paid as high as 87½ per cent; and yet Senators wonder that I cry out against a deadly policy of that character. That is the State in which they are circulating speeches that attack my position, that belittle my position, when my position is a correct position and their position is incorrect. A bank established under the Government is circulating that speech and asking banks dependent upon it for their money supply to write back and tell them how they feel upon that subject.

Listen further to Mr. Lincoln:

I warn them not to permit high and usurious interest rates, contraction of the currency, or any change in the circulating medium that will affect the debt contracted until it has been discharged.

What did I tell you the other day? When prosperity was here, when the cotton producer of my State received $200 per bale for his cotton and when 10 bales would pay a debt incurred of $2,000, I saw this deflation policy, this contraction of the currency, operate in its fury and beat down the price of that cotton to $50 a bale, where 10 bales brought only $500 and where it would take four crops—40 bales of cotton—four years, to pay a debt incurred in one year under the inflation policy.

That is the truth. Why not tell it here?

Here is the concluding statement of Mr. Lincoln:

Any movement to artificially deflate before the debt can be paid, to change the medium or circulation upon which the debt was contracted, would be a crime.

What do you say about that, Senators? What are you going to do? Are you going to stay by the doctrine of Lincoln, or are you going to follow the dictates of Wall Street? Wall Street does not want my resolution to pass. My resolution goes to the very meat of the situation. My resolution says that it is alleged that this action taken in Atlanta was inspired by the Federal Reserve Board governor or some member of the board, and the resolution empowers a committee to investigate the connection of that board and that bank with the political propaganda of the Atlanta bank.

Senators, if my contention is right, am I not entitled to have that truth given to the Senate and to the country? I am not asking you to do that for any personal consideration for me. I am pleading for the good of my country. Will you permit this banking system which has been perverted from the ends of its institution and turned into open notorious politics under the administration of the present board, which changed its politics in the election of 1920, to do that? When we get in power, if the banks are then playing politics, you would stand in your places on the other side of the aisle and say it was very wrong, that it ought not to be permitted, and I would agree with you. It ought not to be permitted at any time. I do not care what party is in power, we ought to keep this system free from that sort of thing.

I am going to read the resolution right here in my speech, because I want the country to know just what the facts are and what the situation is. It reads:

Whereas it is alleged that the officials of the Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta have been and are mailing out literature and speeches of a political nature designed to influence public opinion and injuriously affect the standing and service of a United States Senator; and Whereas it is alleged that said officers are paying for the distribution of said literature and speeches out of the funds of said Federal reserve bank, in violation of law; and

Listen to this, Senators:

Whereas the Senate would regard with keen disapproval the attempt on the part of any one of the Federal reserve banks to use its power to influence or coerce politically any banker or anyone else in its district; and

Whereas Congress in creating the Federal reserve banking system desired and intended that it should at all times be kept free from political activities; and

Whereas such activities of officers of the said Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta are alleged to be the result of the suggestion of the Federal Reserve Board, or some member thereof, and are contrary to law and sound public policy: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Chair shall appoint five Senators, who shall constitute a committee to investigate said actions of said board and bank and report to the Senate their findings thereon and recommendations touching said alleged actions and political activities.

Resolved further, That said committee shall have power to send for persons, papers, and books, to administer oaths and take testimony, to employ a stenographer and pay for his services at not more than $1.25 per printed page of said testimony; and all costs accruing hereunder shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by said committee.

Now, Mr. President, what objection can there be to passing that resolution right now in the open Senate? Why not let the Senate say what it will do with it? Why refer it to the Committee on Banking and Currency, some of the members of which I fear are hostile, and the chairman of it I fear is hostile, to the purposes of my resolution, and one member of the committee is the very man whose speech has been circulated by the bank of Atlanta. I want the country to know the exact situation. A Senator in his place in this body, under his responsibility as one of the Senators of a sovereign State, has denounced what he believes to be an injurious policy of deflation and holds up to criticism the board that inflicted that policy and carried it out. Another Senator assailed that position and his speech is taken up and circulated by a bank, a governmental institution, accompanied by a letter to those whom the bank must serve, to those who must depend upon that bank for accommodation, asking how they feel upon the subject.

Senators, are you going to permit that thing to be done? Is that going to be the deliberate judgment of this body to-day? I would not vote so to refer a resolution of any Senator on the other side of the Chamber where he was involved personally to a hostile committee if speeches were circulated in his State by a Democrat attacking his position and criticizing him and belittling his effort. I would not vote to refer that to a committee where the man was a member of the committee who made the speech against him upon the other side. That is just common fair play, Mr. President.

Why should this resolution of mine be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency when a speech of one of the members of that committee is the proposition in question, is the document that has been circulated, is the one that assails me and my position? Why should this resolution be referred to a committee when the chairman of that committee came over and congratulated the Senator whose speech assailed me and my position? Now to take the resolution that I introduce for the good of the country, for the good of everybody, and refer it to that committee, where it will be buried, chloroformed, as my friend from Georgia has said, does not appeal to me as the fair thing to do.

Mr. President, I hope the Senate will not do that. I hope the Senate will let the resolution go, as such resolutions usually go, to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. This proposition is in it:

That said committee shall have the power to send for persons, papers, and books, to administer oaths and take testimony, to employ a stenographer and pay for his services at not more than $1.25 per printed page of said testimony; and all costs accruing hereunder shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by said committee.

I wish to ask the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE], and any other Senator in the Chamber, what objection there is to allowing the resolution to go to that committee and letting that committee say whether or not $1.25 a page is proper and correct, whether it should be less or whether it should be more, and whether that committee is in a position to take care of the expenses of this investigation or whether it is not in favor of doing so.

Mr. President, that is the proposition.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President—

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to my friend from New Mexico.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I think it wise in this connection to call attention to the fact that such a resolution can not pass unless it be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. That is the law of Congress; it is a statutory regulation; and it seems to me that it is a useless thing to refer the resolution to the Committee on Banking and Currency, at least until after it shall have been approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. The Committee on Banking and Currency may recommend it or it may not do so, but in no event have we any authority to adopt the resolution until it has had the approval of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. So I should say that every reason points to the procedure that the resolution shall first be referred to that committee.

Mr. HEFLIN. I thank my good friend from New Mexico for that suggestion. That was the advice which was given to me by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], who was the Presiding Officer yesterday afternoon when I presented the resolution. He is a clever Republican from the State of Iowa, and I followed the course suggested to me by the then Republican Presiding Officer of this body.

Mr. President, similar resolutions heretofore have, in the main, been submitted to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. That committee has said to the Senator who has introduced the resolution, and to those who are interested in it, "This is all right; the figure you propose to pay is all right, we indorse it; and the expense that you suggest we will take care of." So the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate O. K. the resolution and it is reported back to the Senate. The Senate may then act upon it, and the Senator in charge of the resolution will show to the Senate that the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate has already said that it could take care of the expense suggested in the resolution.

Reference to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate is the proper course. After the resolution should have been reported from that committee, the Senate could then decide whether or not it would consider the resolution, which I hope it may do, or whether it will refer it to some other committee.

Mr. President, I have spoken longer than I intended to speak; the fact is I did not intend to speak at all. I never thought that there would be any objection to the consideration of the resolution this morning. I can not see how there could be any objection to it. It involves a question that is very vital to the welfare of the people back home, in every section of the country, but I do not know whether or not they are very long remembered by some who come here. I have seen votes cast here that indicated to my mind that those back yonder amongst the mass of the people were very soon forgotten by, if, indeed, they ever were very much in the minds and hearts of some men whom I know who get into public life.

Senators, I repeat, this is a vital question which is now presented. Old "Hickory" Jackson, while President, as I have heretofore reminded the Senate, saw the evil of the use of the power of the national banks in politics and he stopped it. We created the greatest banking system that ever was devised by the genius of man; a system under which no power can produce a panic if the system is honestly administered. Whenever the Federal Reserve Board state they have got to "draw in" or have a panic, they tell an untruth against the Federal reserve system. The system was intended to be a panic-proof banking system, and it is such when honestly and intelligently administered. My good friend from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] knows that at the time the legislation was pending those of us who initiated and advocated it said, "If this bill shall become a law we will never see any more hard times such as we have seen, or anything that approaches a panic."

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to my friend from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, since the Senator from Alabama has made that allusion, I hope I may be permitted to say that I predicted at the time that the system would do just exactly what it has done.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the former Senator from Texas, Joe Bailey, used to say that he feared that the Federal Reserve Board had too much power. I criticized him for the position which he took, and he used this expression to me. He said, "Tom, I would not turn over the control of the money supply of this Nation to any five men born of woman." That is what we have done. We have five members appointed by the President, and the Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller of the Currency, who are ex-officio members of the board, making seven in all.

There ought to be more members on that board, and the law should be changed to give all sections representation on it.

It is a great system and we must not allow it to be ruined by the greed of any set of men.

Mr. SIMMONS. Who has got the five members?

Mr. HEFLIN. Who has got the five members? my friend, the able Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], asks me. I have been telling the Senate and the country for 12 months and more who has got those five members. The very newspapers in Wall Street that denounced the system and said it would produce a panic, and that it would not do at all, are now defending the Federal Reserve Board and criticizing me. Who does the Senator from North Carolina suppose has got the five members? Have I got them or has Wall Street got them? My opinion is that Wall Street has got them and dominates them absolutely.

Mr. President, I wish to repeat something I said here the other day. Until President Wilson was stricken down and the Democrats lost the House and the Senate, the Federal reserve system worked with unerring precision; it worked like a Corliss engine; there was never any disturbance anywhere; there was no hitch anywhere. Whenever one Federal reserve bank was in distress the others would go to its rescue; if the people of one locality needed more money than was needed in another, the system would come to its rescue. I remember that when the banks of Philadelphia and Boston, I believe, were in distress, and we did not need the money in the South, for cotton was bringing a good price, business was moving along smoothly, the Federal Reserve Board was functioning properly, and Wall Street stood afar off and did not control it, the Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta, the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas, the Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond, and the Federal Reserve Bank of St. Louis went to the rescue of the banks in Philadelphia and Boston and let them have, as I recall, between $65,000,000 and $75,000,000. So in those days no objection could be raised to the system; but when Woodrow Wilson, the greatest President, in my judgment, that we have had, was stricken down and suffered that long and serious illness, and the Democrats lost control of the House and the Senate, then this trouble commenced.

Anybody could tell by the drift of things that the Republicans were going to win in 1920. They had carried the House and Senate in 1918. The Federal Reserve Board scented it before anybody else; it had its weather eye out, and the head of that board, appointed by a Democrat as a Democrat, is charged by the Washington Times in an editorial, which has never been denied, as saying that he was going to retain his place at the head of that board because he had helped the Republican Party in the election of 1920.

Mr. President, this deflation policy came about and was inaugurated under the authority of a resolution passed by a Republican House and by a Republican Senate and was carried out by a Federal Reserve Board which supported the Republican ticket. Were they trying to help the Republican Party in that election by using their power in politics? Is that the reason some Senators on the other side are not going to vote for my resolution? Mr. President, if there was any understanding that they should help the Republican Party, I want to name four States that we lost on account of that policy. They are Tennessee, Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico. In the States that produce cotton, when cotton fell from 40 cents to 20 cents in October before the election, the farmer could not borrow money on his cotton, as he had done the year before, and so he did not vote the Democratic ticket.

The Democrats suffered because he had an idea that the board was a Democratic board while Wilson was President and he was stricken down and did not know what was going on, and the people were punished. That little taste of politics which the board got then evidently has caused them to pursue a similar course in the case of Senators, for they are taking a hand in senatorial matters. They have written a letter to a Member of the House and suggested to him that he will be punished in the primary if he keeps up his attack on the board, a public institution, and the word is carried to the son-in-law of that Representative, "If you do not get your father-in-law off of this course, you are going to lose your job." Then we find them taking the speech of another Senator, who takes issue with my position, and circulating that speech in a Senator's State accompanied by a letter, I repeat, wanting to know of the banker to whom it is sent what his views are upon the subject and where he stands in the matter.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President—

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to my friend from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was going to suggest for the consideration of the Senator from Alabama that it might be appropriate and helpful if he would reform his resolution so as to provide also for investigation of the letter which he says was written to a Member of the House, setting out that letter.

Mr. HEFLIN. I thank the Senator from North Carolina for that suggestion, but the letter was printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by Representative BRAND, of Georgia, who commented upon it in a speech which he made. Mr. Platt, who wrote the letter, never denied writing it; his signature was attached to it, and it was printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of this Congress.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me further, I have not read that letter, but if it is of the character indicated by the Senator from Alabama, I think there is no Senator here who would dispute the proposition that that letter itself presents a situation which imperatively demands an investigation.

Mr. HEFLIN. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. Therefore I suggest that the Senator include it in his resolution.

Mr. HEFLIN. I would be willing to put that in the resolution, Mr. President; but I thought that question could be reached under the resolution as drawn, because the resolution suggests that the committee shall inquire into the political activities of the members of the board and of the Federal reserve bank at Atlanta.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HEFLIN. I am glad to yield to my friend from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. To show that this is not an isolated case—to show that there is some general plan looking to the control of public men by intimidation on the part of the Federal Reserve Board—I will state to the Senator that I have in my possession a letter which the governor of the bank in Idaho wrote to the commissioner of agriculture of Idaho—a most insolent letter, provoked by an attack which the commissioner of agriculture had made upon the workings of this system, just as the Senator from Alabama is giving offense to them by his attacks—and that letter can not be construed to mean anything else than that unless he ceases to criticize the system they will antagonize him and prevent him from again being commissioner of agriculture of Idaho.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama says that the terms of his resolution are broad enough to justify an investigation into these other matters, but the grounds upon which he makes the request for an investigation are confined to the use of the methods of influencing public opinion in his State against him.

Mr. HEFLIN. The resolution does not mention any name, but it mentions that particular matter.

Mr. SIMMONS. That might be regarded by some as more or less a personal matter, although I think it is an effort to create political sentiment favorable to the bank; but these other letters to which the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Alabama have both referred are letters that upon their face show a purpose on the part of the Federal reserve bank to coerce sentiment in this country in favor of the action taken by the banks and to suppress discussion or criticism of their action. It makes a plain case of interference—dangerous and menacing interference—on the part of this system with the political affairs of this Government and an effort on their part to shape and control sentiment in behalf and in support of their wrongful action if the criticism is correct and true.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. HEFLIN. I am glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. If the Senator from North Carolina will consult Benton's Thirty Years in the Senate, he will find that the national bank of that day, in resisting President Andrew Jackson, resorted to exactly the same means of intimidation that this system has resorted to.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Senator from Georgia is absolutely correct. Therefore I suggest to the Senator from Alabama, not that he broaden the scope of his proposed investigation, for it seems to be sufficiently broad already, but that he broaden the basis, the ground, the cause for the investigation, by setting forth these letters which upon their face show an effort on the part of this bank to control public sentiment in this country. Nothing can be more dangerous, after we have established in this country a system that controls the finances of the country, than to permit that system to enter as a factor into politics, and to use all the power and resources that the people have put at its command by putting it in control of their finances. Control of the politics of the country by an institution of this kind is as menacing now as it was in the days of Andrew Jackson; and I suggest to the Senator that he broaden the basis of his proposed investigation, and then let us see whether the other side of this Chamber have made up their minds—as I am fearful the vote we have just taken indicates—that there shall be no investigation of the criticisms and the alleged wrongdoings of this system.

We did not create the Federal reserve banking system in this country in order that it might become a tyrant, controlling and dictating to the people of this country their action. We did not create it for any such purpose as that; and when it attempts even in the slightest degree to enter the domain of politics it is the duty of the Congress of the United States to make it halt and desist from that dangerous course of action.

I sympathize with the personal position of the Senator from Alabama in this matter. I sympathize with his feeling, but I do hope that he will broaden the basis of his resolution. I do not know what interpretation the Senator places upon the action of the other side of the Chamber in casting a solid vote against referring this matter to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. HEFLIN. Three or four Republicans voted with us.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do know, though, that there can be no investigation of this matter unless there is some money provided in order to finance that investigation—no investigation except a perfunctory look-in on the part of the committee. That sort of an investigation, I take it, the Senator from Alabama does not desire. That sort of an investigation of a question of this sort, I take it, would be a farce, and would not meet the demands of the country. When the other side, by a party vote, voted down that motion, did they mean by that vote to say that there should be no investigation of the charges of the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. HEFLIN. It would appear that they did.

Mr. SIMMONS. If they did, then I ask the Senator from Alabama to supplement his charges with these other charges that do not require any construction, but upon their face show a dangerous activity of this system in the field of politics in this country, and then let them vote down an investigation if they want to do it.

Mr. HEFLIN. I thank the Senator from North Carolina for his suggestion.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to say, if the Senator will pardon me further, that in my judgment the most serious matter in connection with the question we are now discussing is what seems to me—and I think I place a proper interpretation upon it—to be an organized movement on the part of the other side of this Chamber to suppress an investigation into the doings of the Federal Reserve Board. I should be glad if the Senator from Alabama would discuss that phase of the question.

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not see how we can reach any other conclusion than that which the Senator from North Carolina has pointed out. That vote declared to my mind that the other side does not want an investigation of this subject. I shall be glad to broaden the scope of this resolution when we get it back into this Chamber after it goes to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. I suppose that would have to be done first.

Mr. SIMMONS. They have refused now to permit it to go to that committee.

Mr. HEFLIN. But I am hoping that this other motion will be voted down—I may be hoping in vain—and then, when we ask the Senate to consider the resolution in the open, that it will change its mind after this discussion.

Mr. SIMMONS. What I meant to suggest to the Senator was that he should broaden and reform his resolution and introduce it again, and then repeat his motion that it be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. HEFLIN. I will look up the letter of the member of the board, Mr. President.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President—

Mr. HEFLIN. I am glad to yield to my good friend from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH. I felt like suggesting to the Senator from North Carolina and the Senator from Alabama that as the basis of this controversy between the Senator from Virginia and the Senator from Alabama has been whether or not the system in its proper operation has brought about the disastrous conditions that exist in this country, or whether they were brought about by the disastrous policy of those who had the system in charge, I rather think it is time right now to have a competent and thorough investigation of the system from the head to the member banks. Let us bring them in and swear them, and let us find out why the condition in which we find ourselves has occurred, who brought it about, who was responsible. Let us put the men on their oaths, and find out whether or not the conditions that now obtain were brought about by virtue of certain well-understood policies and orders or agreements that may not appear on paper, but which men would not deny if put on their oaths. Let us start at the head and go to the foot, and let the American people judge as to whether this system has been righteously administered in the face of the dangerous conditions that confronted us, and go to the bottom of the whole business.

If the Senator prefers to take this resolution—which, if I were in his place, I would, since it involves a question of himself personally—I think I shall introduce a resolution, and let it take its fate, to have a proper committee appointed to investigate this whole question of all parties concerned in the administration of our Federal reserve system from the time when it began the deflation until the present day, and put men on their oaths—member banks, State banks, the "whole push"—and let us know just who is responsible or whether they are responsible for this condition. My opinion or your opinion is not worth the paper on which it is written as long as the people do not know the facts; but the people do know that they are without the means to transact ordinary business; that prices have dropped to a point where everybody who produces in this country is practically bankrupt; and that there is a boast of the fact that in spite of that condition there is $1,700,000,000 of free, idle gold in this country against which there is not a Federal reserve note or an obligation of any kind. If we have no law by which we can utilize that money it is the duty of the Senate to see that we do have a law by which we can utilize it.

Have we converted the people into the horrible condition of a Tantalus, that the flood reaches just to their lips, and that they must thirst to death in a flood tide of plenty, because our law so fixed it that it will just reach their lips and no further? Let us investigate this situation from top to bottom and put the blame where it belongs. Let us not merely take glimpses of it here and there, but view the whole situation.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Alabama, I might say to the Senator from South Carolina that exactly this condition existed in England just exactly a hundred years ago, and that the Bank of England brought it about by doing exactly what the Federal Reserve Board does.

Mr. SMITH. I want to ask the Senator from Georgia a question, if the Senator from Alabama will allow me. In view of the criticism of the system and the defense of the system, while the people are suffering, does not the Senator think it is due the Federal reserve system, the Senate of the United States, the Congress of the United States, and the people of the United States that we investigate this thing fearlessly and thoroughly and find out where the blame belongs and fix the responsibility?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Answering the Senator, I will say yes, and I will tell him how the situation was handled in England 100 years ago, when the Bank of England did exactly what the Federal Reserve Board has done—destroyed the paper currency. They brought about such a calamitous state of affairs that Parliament first had to feed an army of unemployed out of the public treasury and the Government had to issue exchequer bills to increase the amount of currency in circulation, and thus the panic was lifted—was banished—instantly upon the issuance of those exchequer treasury notes.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I have been forced by a sense of my duty to make the statement I have just made. I have not referred at all to the controversy between the Senator from Virginia and the Senator from Alabama—

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, if I may correct the Senator from South Carolina, there is no controversy between the Senator from Virginia and the Senator from Alabama. I made a speech which occupied 47 printed pages in pamphlet form, and, incidentally, I twice referred to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. Oh, Mr. President, I can not permit that statement to go unchallenged. The Senator from Virginia made several references to me, and took up a statement I made about the extravagances indulged in the building of the Federal reserve banking house in New York, stating that there were six instances in which I referred to that, and that in all of them I was wrong. I showed in my speech the facts as stated by John Skelton Williams, which speech will be printed in the RECORD in the next two or three days, showing that the Senator from Virginia was entirely wrong and that I was right. There is a matter of controversy about the issue involved, and there were several personal references made by the Senator from Virginia to me. I said I did not agree with the Senator in a good many things he was saying and that I would answer him later, and he answered that by saying that he did not expect I would agree with him about anything. The Senator displayed a disposition to criticize and belittle the part I played in this matter.

I have no personal feeling in the matter toward the Senator, but the Senator made a speech, and in it made many points that the Federal Reserve Board has made in antagonizing the position I have taken, and he made one or two points which Mr. Platt of the board suggested in his letter to Mr. BRAND from Georgia. I do not know whether the Senator saw those points stated in that letter, or whether they occurred to him, too, as they did to the board at that time, but no man can read the speech of the Senator from Virginia and get any other impression but that he was belittling and making light of my position. He referred a number of times to the things I had said about the deflation policy of the Federal Reserve Board and characterized them as "pitiful nonsense" and wicked mummery, using expressions like that. He insinuated that those who did not agree with him were demagogues. I do not object to that, because I heard what he said and I paid my respects to him and his speech as well as I could in an hour and 15 minutes immediately following his speech. I did not have any notice he was going to speak, but some of the members of the Federal Reserve Board were here listening to his speech, so it impressed me, being a man of an inquiring mind, that the word that he was going to speak and attack my position must have gotten to the board, because I never saw them here before, and have not seen them here since.

I am the only Senator to whom the Senator referred frequently throughout his speech, and I am the only Senator, so far as I know, who has received a letter telling him that the speech is being circulated in his State.

Why is that speech being circulated? It belittles my position. It throws off on the stand I took and it carries to the voters of my State, through a bank operating under the Government, propaganda which seeks to quietly and sneakily undermine and injure a Senator, when those people do not know what he has said about the subject.

I join with the Senator from South Carolina in his query. What is the opinion of a Senator worth to the people for whom he battles unless he can get the truth of his position to them? The Federal Reserve Board, with the Wall Street agencies back of it, has money to circulate speeches of any man who assails my position, but I have no such means. The first 1,000 copies of the speech of the Senator from Virginia cost $50 a thousand or thereabouts.

This agent at Atlanta admits he sent it to business men in all those States, to bankers, members and nonmembers, and to corporations, sending the speeches out by the hundreds and the thousands, writing letters and putting 2-cent stamps on them, and the bank's funds are being gone into to defray the expenses incurred. They assailed me, as well as the position I have taken as Senator in behalf of 60,000,000 people in the South and West, who have been slaughtered under that deadly deflation policy. Now they come here and say that we ought to just drop this. I have not the money to circulate my speech as that other speech is being circulated. It would cost $50 or $60 a thousand to circulate my speech. There is no concrete movement on the part of men with money to distribute my speech in order that the people may know the truth and know the position of one who has dared to champion their cause.

Mr. President, I said that the deflation policy carried out by this board was called for and inspired by a resolution introduced into this body by the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK], and passed through a Republican Senate. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] rose and said that it meant deflation and depression, and he said it was being inspired by Chicago and New York. I am not the only Senator in this body who takes the stand that this deflation policy was cruel and deadly. There is not a Senator from the South who is really a friend of the people, except the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], who will stand upon this floor and say, and let his constituents know that he had said that he indorsed the deflation policy of the Federal Reserve Board. I pause for such a Senator, if he be here, to rise now and make that statement. He is not here.

Let the people know about these things. They have got to know. I am willing to spend and be spent in the service of those whose Government this is. Are we going to permit the Nation's great banking system to become a powerful political agency, seeking to control the actions of the lawmaking body of the country? Senators, if it is put in the hands of a banking system to raise the rediscount rate from 3 per cent to 7 per cent, and exercise the power to employ that rate to beat down business, kill the borrowing spirit, stop loans from being granted, destroy business, impoverish the people, and break their morale, it is the duty of a Senator to cry out against it and suggest a change if he thinks it should be had. But if this thing is to be permitted, the Government banks will intimidate your lawmakers and threaten to punish them at the polls.

We will fight you secretly. We will take somebody else's speech, well prepared and designed for certain purposes, and we will circulate that among your people. We will write letters to be sent with it. We will get expressions from the bankers in your State before they can ever know your position, because we hold the purse strings, and they must come to us for money to supply their wants.

The other side has to-day refused a Senator's request to make an investigation of the charges made against a Federal reserve bank in his territory which has admittedly been circulating speeches, according to an officer of the bank, which has been circulating letters, which an officer of the bank admits he circulated, admitting they have asked questions of bankers as to what they thought about the speech of the Senator from Virginia. What are we coming to?

I am speaking in behalf of thirty-odd million people in the South who have suffered God only knows how much. I told the Senate in my speech the other day about one little farmer who had a nice little home out in my county, and a wife and two children, a boy about 12 or 14 and a daughter about 6; that this deflation crash caught him, and that the price of his produce was beaten down away below the cost of production, and that he had to throw it on the market. The crash got his little home and his little farm, and I saw him moving with his wife and his little boy and girl, leaving the community where he was born and reared, going off to work in a cotton factory to make a living, which he had failed to do that year upon the farm, when under conditions that were favorable he was becoming a prosperous young farmer, and owned his little farm.

Mr. President, a policy that will destroy a man's business like that, which will destroy his spirit, which will crush him in his young manhood, is a deadly and a dangerous policy. Just what they did to that young farmer they did to thousands and hundreds of thousands in the South and West.

I told the Senate one day about a man out in the West who had written to me and said, "I saw that you made reference to two bankers, one in South Carolina and one in Georgia, who had killed themselves." They had endured the strain as long as they could, and then blew out their brains. He said, "I want to give you an instance. I knew a man who lived in this community, who owned a place for which he had been offered ninety or a hundred thousand dollars, and he was involved, having a big crop and a lot of stock and farm produce. The crash came, and the banks told him that they could not help him; they could not carry his paper any longer, that he must pay. He said, 'I owe you only $25,000, and I have a place worth over $100,000 and a lot of farm produce.' They said, 'But you must pay.' He said, 'If I have to pay, it will take my place, and I could not raise $15,000 in money. You will sweep everything away that I have.'"

What did they say? They said, "We are very sorry, but you will have to pay." That man had a wife and four children, and he brooded over it, seeing all swept away under this cruel condition which had caught him and which was crushing him to death, and he killed his wife, killed his four children, and killed himself—wiped out the family.

That deflation policy took that man's farm. That deflation policy destroyed his produce. That deflation policy made him kill the wife he had promised to love, cherish, and protect; made him take the life of the woman who had borne his children and fought the battle along with him up to that prosperous time, and that deflation policy made him kill himself.

Let me read to you, Senators, from testimony of those who agree with me. The volumes are full of it. This is from the president of the American Cotton Association:

In September, 1920, after insistent demands for a more liberal policy, Mr. Harding—

That is, Gov. Harding—invited leaders in the cotton industry to Washington to discuss the situation and at that time issued an ambiguous statement which many of the leaders took at its face value—

Listen, Senators—

and went home full of hope and expressing the highest appreciation of the attitude of Gov. Harding and the Federal Reserve Board. They wrote articles and made speeches and lulled their people into a sense of security. It was believed that every facility would be given the farmer to market his cotton in an orderly manner; in other words, that he could borrow money on his cotton for his immediate needs and hold the cotton until the demand made a satisfactory market, but that fools' paradise was shattered on October 8—when, after another conference, held this time in Birmingham, Gov. Harding ripped the mask from his policies and the cotton producer realized at last that he could expect no help from that quarter. Not only did he realize that he could expect no help, but he found out that what was supposed to be an agency of support to him in a crisis had been transformed into an instrument being used to beat him to his knees. With studied misunderstanding, with studied misrepresentation of the demands and the needs of the cotton producer, Gov. Harding thus brutally blasted his hope.

Just a little while before election—

Mr. President, that board denies that it carried on a deflation policy. One or two have dared to defend their position in that regard and join them in denying it. Yet here is what Mr. Wannamaker, who is president of the American Cotton Association, said came in response to inquiries from him as to who did cause it. Listen:

We sent out thousands of these questions: What effect has this had upon you individually?—

He was referring to the deflation policy—

What effect has it had upon your community and upon your section? To whom do you attribute the condition to-day? Upon whom do you place the blame?

Listen:

And, gentlemen of the commission—

This is Mr. Wannamaker testifying before the commission, of which my good friend the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] was a member:

And, gentlemen of the commission, to this question 98 per cent of the answers came: "We place the blame for the condition that exists to-day upon the policy of the Federal Reserve Board." I repeat, 98 per cent of the answers came in that way.

There were thousands of those questionnaires sent out.

I want to read what the Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond said in circular No. 98, under date of July 7, 1920, when this thing was ready to start in all its wickedness and fury. From the Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond there is the following statement—listen, Senators:

The rise in rates has checked borrowing or expansion, as it was intended to do.

Mr. President, what more proof do you want? There is a statement from the Federal reserve bank at Richmond, made with the knowledge and consent of the Federal Reserve Board, and yet they deny that they have carried on a deflation policy, and they want me to falsify the record with them and deny it. I refuse to do it. I agree with Mr. Wannamaker.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HEFLIN. I am glad to yield to my friend from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I remind the Senator from Alabama that the leading editorial in the New York Herald two or three days ago was an analysis of the official report of the Federal Reserve Board recently issued, and drew attention to the fact that the Federal Reserve Board had prevented a panic by destroying a thousand million dollars of paper money in 12 months, which was the amount that they had destroyed in that 12 months, and that the process was going on until the amount of money destroyed was nearly two thousand million dollars. That statement that they had destroyed the money, decreased the circulation, and brought on the panic which they called deflation was based upon that report.

Mr. HEFLIN. Yet they deny in the face of such statements as that that they carried out a dangerous and destructive deflation policy. Of course, that is what we charge. We charge that when the community needed money most they took it away. We did not need as much money in 1919, and yet the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] in his speech stood up here and showed that they had let them have a little more money for certain months in 1920 than they had in 1919. We did not need it in 1919. We were prosperous then. We were then sending money from our reserve bank to help Philadelphia and Boston. We did not need it; but in 1920, and in July especially, when the crash commenced, going down and down, the farmer was losing $5 and $10 a day on a bale of cotton. On 10 bales he was losing a hundred dollars, and that meant a heap to that little man. Then they sat down and said, "We do not want to sell this, because we have already lost a hundred dollars on 10 bales in 5 days or 10 days. We want to borrow money to hold it off the market, and then it will go back and we will get a good price." They were told, "We can not let you have the money." And that is where the trouble was.

The farmer was destroyed and that money was drawn out of the community, but that did not mean it went into retirement right then. It went to New York and call money went up and up and up, and that helped to drain the money out of the country under this deflation policy, and the farmer could not get the money. The speculator got what he wanted. He could beat down the price and the farmer could not get any to help hold up the price, and the farming industry nearly died under that system.

Now, one of the banks that was maladministered under the policy of Gov. Harding and his board is being used to send out attacks upon me, who dares to defend the people in my State, nearly 3,000,000 people, who suffered and suffered greatly under that very policy.

Mr. President, the action taken by the Senate has caused me to take this course. This is the most important question that is now before the Senate. There is nothing more important. Lincoln once said:

The crisis that I see approaching unnerves me, and I tremble for the safety of my country.

I want to say to you that if the time ever comes when a Senator in this body will be so coerced and intimidated by the banking power out yonder that he dare not stand up here and say that this interest rate or that is wrong, that this rediscount rate or that is wrong, for fear that he will be destroyed, they will destroy the courage of many a man who if left undisturbed would do what he thought was best for his country. Is the Senate to be composed of men who dare not oppose but who smile and bow to the dictates of a conscienceless money power?

Do you want to invite that situation, Senators? Do you want to help create a condition like that? When you deny an investigation of this system, of this thing that is charged, you are striking a body blow at the best interests of your country. When you deny to a Senator the right to have a situation of this kind investigated, where speeches are being used as propaganda to further one Senator's idea against another's, I do not care whether it is my speech or the speech of the Senator from Virginia, it is wrong.

I do not want any bank to circulate my speeches where I have attacked another Senator in this body. I will fight it out with him here. I believe in striking in the open. If the Government bank were to ask me if it could use my frank for that purpose, I would say, "No. You stay out of politics. We put you in the banking business to stay clear of politics and run only the banking business, and now you are trying to take a hand in politics. It is dangerous. It is a power you ought not to exercise."

I appeal to Senators on the other side of the aisle to vote with me upon this question and to keep this resolution out of the Committee on Banking and Currency. Before I sit down I want to say this further word: I want to repeat as to the Senator's speech which is being circulated, not only in my State but all over the Southern States, to merchants, bankers, and members and nonmembers, corporations, and other people in business, that they are writing letters to them about the attacks on me to get replies before they can ever see what my position is and whether I am right or wrong.

I say to Senators that that is wrong, and that the resolution ought not to be referred to the committee on which sits the Senator who is antagonistic to my position, and whose position I criticize and assail. It ought not to go to the committee of which he is a member, and it ought not to go to a committee the chairman of which agrees with the member of the committee who made the speech and who, as I said, came over and congratulated him on the speech in which he attacked me.

Senators, if you take that course it will rise to haunt you some of these days. You are going to set a precedent, and then some Senator will rise and say, "Oh, yes; I remember the occasion when you considered the resolution offered by Senator HEFLIN, when he wanted to keep banks out of politics. I remember what you did with that. I remember you referred it to the very committee on which the man who made the speech criticizing him was sitting as a member." Do you want to establish a precedent like that? I appeal to you not upon a partisan basis, I appeal to you as an American.

As an American I appeal to your love of country. I appeal to you to do that which is best for the country. Thousands of boys followed that flag on foreign battle fields and died in its name; thousands of American boys are lame and halt and blind to-day who followed it and offered their all for the preservation of this Republic. What would those boys think to-day, some of them sightless and others who left a leg or an arm on the battle field in France, if, sitting in the gallery, they should hear denied the plea of a Senator for a clean condition, a condition which should keep the dollar from being the dominant power in politics; the plea of a Senator that the banking system be kept out of the business of spreading political propaganda against a Senator who is asking for fair play and justice in matters of this kind, and for the encouragement and preservation of free speech in America?

They would say, "We did all we could to preserve the Republic and we come back and find it now in the hands of a party that is undertaking to encourage the use of money in politics and to put the Government banks in politics, and permit them to intimidate and coerce men; to use the banking system not to serve the needs of the people, but to browbeat and destroy their public servants and to suppress free speech in the Government."

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, while the Senator from Alabama is always most eloquent and interesting, still I can not conceive just why the motion which has been made and is now before the Senate should have inspired this discussion of the merits of the resolution. I am not going to discuss the merits of the resolution, because, except in so far as I have been able to follow the statements of the Senator from Alabama, I am in no way familiar with its merits. It seems to me, however, that the orderly and businesslike manner of considering such an important subject—and I in no way minimize its importance—is to follow that course which is consistent with the fundamental rules and principles of all legislative bodies, so far as that is concerned, and certainly of the Senate of the United States.

In order to facilitate business, various committees are provided. Those committees are charged with well-known, distinct responsibilities. Every measure that is introduced into the Senate is automatically referred to one of those committees, unless unanimous consent is asked and granted for its immediate consideration. In the case of resolutions dealing with equally important subjects, it seems to me there should be absolutely no differentiation. The question of order seems to be the only question, so far as I have followed the discussion, which should be considered at this time.

As to whether the resolution should first be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate or to the Committee on Banking and Currency, I have heard it suggested by various Senators—I think by the Senator from Alabama and by others who interrupted him during the course of his discussion—that it has been almost a universal rule first to submit resolutions to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. As a matter of fact, I have not had an opportunity to look up the record, and it would make very little difference to me, so far as my judgment of the proper procedure is concerned, as to what the record shows; but I have learned that the resolution providing for one of the most important investigating committees now in session—I think perhaps the last investigating committee which has been authorized by the Senate—the committee investigating the activities of those who are interested in the dye industry, was upon its presentation first referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, then reported to the Senate, and subsequently referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. The investigation has been begun and is under way at the present moment. Therefore the question of the merits of the resolution offered by the Senator from Alabama does not, it seems to me, enter at all, nor should enter at all, into the discussion to-day.

I have simply taken the floor in defense of my motion that the Committee on Banking and Currency should first consider the necessity and advisability of the proposed investigation. I am quite sure that no Senator will seriously contend that that committee will not give the resolution proper and careful consideration. It is constituted, as every committee is constituted, of members of the majority and members of the minority. As a member of the committee, I will with great interest further examine the resolution and consider any discussion or evidence which the Senator from Alabama sees fit to bring before the committee. I am quite sure that the Senator is perfectly well aware that the committee will act upon the resolution according to the merits of the testimony presented to the committee, as I believe all other committees of the Senate under the control of either party always do.

So the question before the Senate is not at all the question as to whether the Federal Reserve Board have adopted an unfortunate policy in connection with the so-called deflation or otherwise. Much may be said on that subject on both sides of the controversy. The question before the Senate is purely the question of orderly procedure, recognizing the foundation upon which our procedure is erected, and recognizing that committees have responsibilities and that their members are supposed to be familiar with the subject matter of which they have jurisdiction. It appears to me that an important resolution of this character—and the suggestion which has been made by Senators that it ought to be broadened makes the contention all the more pertinent—should first be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency in order that they may investigate the advisability and necessity of such an investigation as is proposed.

The work of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses, I understand, is purely perfunctory. They simply decide whether or not the money is available with which to conduct the investigation; their examination does not go at all into the subject matter of the resolution. That committee is merely a general finance committee having jurisdiction over the expenses of the Senate and of the contingent fund. So, if this question is a question of such supreme importance—and I believe it is; I agree with the Senator from Alabama that it is—as to inspire him to make a three-hour speech, then it is all the more important that the Committee on Banking and Currency, which is charged with the consideration of all legislation dealing with the Federal Reserve Board and its activities, should give this resolution and all similar resolutions consideration and be responsible for their final judgment and final action upon them.

Mr. HEFLIN. Just a word, Mr. President. The Senator from New Jersey suggests that what he says is in the interest of orderly procedure. On yesterday I consulted the President pro tempore, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], who was then in the chair—I do not know whether the Senator from New Jersey heard me refer to the fact earlier in my remarks—and he suggested the very course which I have pursued as the orderly and correct course. I told him that I would be here this morning to pursue it. I have followed that suggestion, and other Senators agree with me that the course I have suggested is the one which should be pursued.

Now, as to the Senator's statement that suggestions have been made about amending my resolution if it is referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses, I can offer amendments here and have them referred to the committee. So it is not necessary to hold this matter up at all, but my resolution can go to the committee, and I can submit amendments to it, and they can be referred to the committee. I am protesting against sending this resolution to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and I want the Senate and the country to know what the issue is. I have stated my reasons for the action I have taken. Of course, the Senate may adopt whatever course it chooses; but at the conclusion of the Senator's remarks, or whenever the debate shall have been concluded, I shall make the point of no quorum in order to have a vote on the question.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia obtained the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I merely wish to ask a question of the Senator from New Jersey if the Senator from Georgia will allow me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. I understood the Senator from New Jersey to say that the question at issue did not involve the merits of the matter, but that the resolution should go to the Committee on Banking and Currency purely in the interest of orderly procedure.

Mr. EDGE. That is where the resolution should first be referred; yes.

Mr. HARRISON. To the Banking and Currency Committee?

Mr. EDGE. I think so.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator would not the Committee on Rules be the proper committee to which to refer the resolution rather than the Banking and Currency Committee? Inasmuch as it involves the creation of a special committee, if we were going to send it to any committee other than the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, would not the Rules Committee, the procedure committee of the Senate, be the proper one to which the resolution should be referred and not the Banking and Currency Committee?

Mr. EDGE. It would not be my judgment that that would be the proper procedure at all. I mentioned the fact that the resolution which created the committee to investigate the activities of those interested in the dye industry took exactly the course which I have suggested by the motion which I have made that the pending resolution shall take. The dye investigation resolution was first referred to the committee supposed to be familiar with the subject matter, namely, the Judiciary Committee, to consider the charges involved in connection with those who were in Washington reputed to be representing the dye industry. From that committee the resolution was reported to the Senate and was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. The pending resolution, if the motion I have made shall be adopted, will take exactly the same course.

I do not question for a moment the fact that the President pro tempore, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], suggested that the ordinary procedure would be first to refer it to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. As a general rule, that is so; but I am stating that in the case of resolutions which are extremely important and which, as the Senator says, go to the fundamentals of government, and particularly in the case of a resolution of such importance that it has inspired the Senator to make the speech he has made, it should not simply be referred to a general financial committee and then come back on the floor, but such resolutions ought to be referred to a committee of 16 Senators who are familiar with and are appointed to study banking and currency affairs and problems. That is exactly my contention, and to a great extent it is based on the Senator's own suggestions.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. HEFLIN. If the Senator will yield for just a second, I should like to ask the Senator from New Jersey a question.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. If the resolution goes, as I suggest that it go, to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and they O. K. the expense part of it, and it comes back to the Senate, then I will have an opportunity to move that it be taken up and considered and not go to any committee; but if the Senator sends it now to the Banking and Currency Committee, it will be out of the reach of the Senate and will not go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. EDGE. Oh, no, Mr. President. It is quite true that temporarily it may not be before the Senate. The Senator from Alabama knows perfectly well, however, that any committee of the Senate at any time would listen to a Senator who was the proponent of a measure and would give him every opportunity to endeavor to have his measure reported; and I contend that it is absolutely without justification to contend that that committee will not treat the resolution entirely as the merits of the resolution would dictate that it should be treated.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Yes; I yield.

Mr. FRANCE. I noted with interest the statement of the Senator from New Jersey that the committee would give a Senator an opportunity to endeavor to have a measure reported. I do not think that anybody who is a Member of the Senate would go so far as to say that a committee would refuse to allow a Senator to have an opportunity to endeavor to have his measure reported, but I do not contemplate that it is the desire of the Senator from Alabama merely to have an opportunity to endeavor. I myself have been given the opportunity to endeavor to have several important measures reported, and some of my measures are still in the committee, and have been in the committee since January, 1919.

I should like to ask the Senator, before taking my seat, why he considers the mere question of having an investigation made such a momentous question, a question fraught with such tremendous issues? Why is that in itself such a momentous question? Personally, as a member of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I have been inclined to vote for any reasonable investigation of any matter which falls within the jurisdiction of the Senate, and I have never considered that an investigation in itself was a momentous question. Sometimes the results are quite important and sometimes they are somewhat unimportant; but it does seem to me that the suggestion that there may be some very momentous reason for not having this investigation made is quite interesting.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I hope Senators will not go into a general discussion.

Mr. FRANCE. I did not mean to trespass upon the Senator's time. I merely wished to ask that question.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Georgia will permit me, I shall endeavor to be quite brief in replying to the query of the Senator from Maryland.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Yes. I hope the Senator will be brief.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, there are investigations and investigations. I do not propose to pass upon the merits of this one, as I have stated, I think, several times. I will consider this resolution as I would consider any other matter of legislation or any other resolution; but in answer to the Senator from Maryland I will say that while the thought I am going to express refers in no way to this resolution I do think that we have entirely too many investigations as a matter of good, common-sense business development of the country. Some investigations bring forth splendid results, and should be made; but I do think it is the duty of Senators, as individual Senators and in their membership on committees, to give serious consideration to requests for investigations. Some investigations have resulted in absolutely nothing but a tremendous expense to the Government of the United States. As I say, I am not referring to this investigation. I think there is a great deal of merit in the proposal, as far as I have been able to listen to the testimony that has been given; but I am speaking now in answer to the Senator from Maryland. If he implies that any Senator who introduces a resolution asking for an investigation should be granted the investigation, I absolutely and most emphatically disagree with that policy.

THE FOUR-POWER TREATY.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, we did not pay to the memory of George Washington very much tribute on yesterday. So far as I recall, not a word in the way of eulogy was pronounced in the Senate Chamber. Whether or not the country will be surprised at that, I do not know. Whether the world will be surprised, I do not know. The man whose birthday was honored yesterday, in some places, was in many respects the greatest man this world ever saw—not the greatest soldier; there were many greater; not the greatest statesman, there were many who were greater; but a greater man, in my judgment, never walked the earth—a character as strong as an Alpine mountain and as pure as the snow that sleeps on its summit; a man who, when he lay dead at Mount Vernon, excited such admiration and regret in England that the fleet in the channel lowered its flag; and Napoleon Bonaparte in France issued an order of the day to his armies to honor Washington's memory. In the British Parliament the greatest of English statesmen, Charles Fox, paid him a tribute which Caesar did not deserve, Alexander the Great did not deserve, William Pitt did not deserve, and no King of England ever deserved.

Washington was great in this, Mr. President: He lifted himself above party; his mind was as broad as the continent; his wisdom was not only for his day, but for our day and all days; and if we have reached the point in our national development when we discard his teachings and no longer follow his counsels, I should like to inquire from what source emanates the wisdom that is greater than that of Washington, when Washington's has been vindicated by a hundred years of unparalleled growth and wealth and strength in his Republic? Who are these wise men that want us to change our policies? Who are the statesmen, who are the leaders, what are the influences that overcome the teachings of this wise American, who said, time and again, that he was a nationalist and not an internationalist, an American and not a cosmopolitan?

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. FRANCE. I am very much interested in the remarks of the Senator, and it has occurred to me that it would be very desirable to have a quorum present to hear his remarks. If the Senator will yield, I will suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I must ask the Senator not to do that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia declines to yield for that purpose.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, if the Senator from Georgia will permit me—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator recalls that in the Farewell Address of Washington, which was read on yesterday, Washington appealed to his countrymen to beware of the power of money in politics; and yet at the conclusion of the day on which his Farewell Address was read three Senators on the other side objected to the immediate consideration of a resolution that sought to investigate a bank that was in politics up to its neck.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, Washington, like Jefferson and Madison and Monroe, realized the marvelous geographical position which this country holds. There is no country on earth, nor did there ever exist a country, having the natural geographical advantages that we possess. No other country is defended on the one side by the Atlantic, separating us by 3,000 miles from any possible attack, defended on the other side by the Pacific, protecting us there with inexpensive barriers—barriers made by the Almighty, and which cost us nothing to maintain—against possible attack on that side. The Great Lakes on the north, the Gulf on the south, are natural barriers, bulwarks, fortifications that cost us nothing, and that will endure forever.

England has no such advantages. A narrow channel separates her from Ireland upon the one side and from France upon the other, and the Baltic is not such a very great sea to protect her from the northern powers. France has no such advantages. She is surrounded, she is encircled, she is girdled by nations that are jealous of her and that hate her. Japan has no such advantages, the island kingdom with 400,000,000 possible enemies waiting for the time when they can take revenge upon Japan for the wrongs which they claim she has done them. Russia also is within striking distance of Japan.

Washington saw America's natural advantages. Another one which I will mention is that we hold Canada as a hostage for the good behavior of England. Canada is open to our attack the very moment a declaration of war is issued by the British Government. England dares not clench her fist at us, because she knows we could seize Canada and hold it against any force that she could send across the seas. To the south of us we have natural defenses, if we will simply avail ourselves of them. Treat Mexico right, and we will have a buffer State that will add to our natural strength. Treat the South American Republics right, and this continent will always stand together, a brotherhood of American nations and of American blood, to fight any foreign foe.

Talk about statesmanship, Mr. President. It seems to me we have made no improvement over the statesmanship of Washington, the outlines of which I have thus briefly given.

One of the biographies of George Washington was written by HENRY CABOT LODGE, the senior Senator from Massachusetts, whose "erudite cloistered aloofness" was referred to by Col. George Harvey in one of his happy London speeches. From page 217, volume 2 of Senator Lodge's biography of Washington, I read:

His foreign policy had, however, some immediate practical results which were of vast importance. In December, 1795, he wrote to Morris—

That is, Gouverneur Morris, our minister to France at that time—

"It is well known that peace has been (to borrow a modern phrase) the order of the day with me since the disturbances in Europe first commenced. My policy has been, and will continue to be while I have the honor to remain in the administration, to maintain friendly terms with, but to be independent of, all the nations of the earth; to share in the broils of none; to fulfill our own engagements; to supply the wants and be carriers for them all; being thoroughly convinced that it is our policy and interest to do so. Nothing short of self-respect and that justice which is essential to a national character ought to involve us in war; for sure I am, if this country is preserved in tranquillity 20 years longer, it may bid defiance in a just cause to any power whatever; such in that time would be its population, wealth, and resources."

The date, remember, was 1795. If Washington believed that in 20 years from that time we would be invincible, secure from attack from any nation on earth, what would he say now, when our population is more than 100,000,000, and when our wealth is such that history never knew anything like it before? There is the germ of the Farewell Address, Mr. President. That was in a private letter to our minister to France. It was simply elaborated and put in semi-official form when he issued his Farewell Address.

Here is the comment of Senator-Author HENRY CABOT LODGE. I read from his original text:

"In one word, Washington, in policies and politics, was an American and a nationalist."

Finally, the author Senator closes his book with these words, which, Mr. President, I consider far more beautiful than that prose poem which he wrote about those Pacific Islands:

As I bring these volumes to a close, I am conscious that they speak so far as they speak at all, in a tone of almost unbroken praise of the great man they attempt to portray. If this be so, it is because I could come to no other conclusions. For many years I have studied minutely the career of Washington, and with every step the greatness of the man has grown upon me, for analysis has failed to discover the act of his life which, under the conditions of the time, I could unhesitatingly pronounce to have been an error. Such has been my experience, and although my deductions may be wrong, they at least have been carefully and slowly made. I see in Washington a great soldier who fought a trying war to a successful end impossible without him; a great statesman who did more than all other men to lay the foundations of a republic which has endured in prosperity for more than a century. I find in him a marvelous judgment which was never at fault, a penetrating vision, which beheld the future of America when it was dim to other eyes, a great intellectual force, a will of iron, an unyielding grasp of facts, and an unequalled strength of patriotic purpose. I see in him, too, a pure and high-minded gentleman of dauntless courage and stainless honor, simple and stately in manner, kind and generous of heart. Such he was in truth. The historian and the biographer may fail to do him justice, but the instinct of mankind will not fail. The real hero needs not books to give him worshippers. George Washington will always hold the love and reverence of men because they see embodied in him the noblest possibilities of humanity.

Mr. President, on yesterday, when the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] was reading the Farewell Address, it seemed to me that the performance was mechanical. There was no warmth of tone or manner. There was no emphasis to distinguish one portion of it from another, and when he reached that distinctive doctrine which we now know by the name of the Monroe doctrine, but whose kernel is in that Farewell Address, and in the letter to Mr. Morris, the Senator from Washington skidded along as if he were skating on thin ice.

England wants us, and apparently she is going to get us, and Mr. Balfour did carry "a present" when he went back to London, a present to King George and Great Britain. She had achieved, or will soon have achieved, what has been her purpose ever since the Colonies broke her yoke. She has gotten the benefit of our unlimited money and our unlimited man power, and she needed both.

France wanted security; she wanted her future underwritten and guaranteed, and she has it.

Japan knew that her position was weak, unpopular, fatal in its structural character, binding her to ages of strife; and now she has another partner along with England to guarantee her from the attack of Russia or China.

We are told by the President of the United States, and by other eulogists of the four-power treaty, that a millenium of brotherly love will ensue; that there will be no future wars, although humanity remains unchanged.

Peace, Mr. President, is the dream of the philosopher, but war is the history of man. That is an old statement, as old as written record. Man is a fighting animal, and when he ceases to be so he is not worth his victuals and clothes. Men will fight about anything. Talk about binding four warlike nations with scraps of paper! It never was done; it can not be done; it never will be done until you give us another human nature.

Nations have gone to war about women. There was an Italian war that cost 10,000 lives in a dispute about an old well bucket. Men have fought because of an insolent joke; and another war was started when a king's scarlet woman was offended by the remark made by old Frederick the Great in commenting upon her doubtful character.

Men fight for the possession of trade routes, of natural resources, of oil fields, of mineral deposits, of timberlands. There are numberless causes of strife; and when we remember that there has never been an end to strife from the time Cain killed Abel, I can not understand how experienced historians, like the senior Senator from Massachusetts, or experienced men of affairs, like the President of the United States, could believe for one minute that you can make any kind of agreement, signed up in any sort of way, which will banish war.

If they meant it, why do they not disband the Army, why do they not scrap more battleships, why do they have men going up in these dirigibles or airplanes and coming hurtling to their death? Preparations for war are as great now as they were a hundred years ago. There are millions more men withdrawn from peaceful pursuits and devoted to learning the art of killing one another than there were a hundred years ago. If we believe we have established peace, why not disband the Army and trust to the National Guard and other militia forces?

Why not scrap all the battleships if we have no more need for them? Why have men day after day and month after month been perfecting superior guns and seeking to construct airplanes and dirigibles that will not fall? We do not believe it ourselves, Mr. President.

What will be the effect of this four-power treaty on the nations not embraced in it? It will naturally arouse jealousy. Germany will not always be prostrate. Sixty-odd million people can not be kept down. Russia will not always be torn by internal dissension and oppressed by the hostility of foreign nations. Mr. President, these very nations—Germany and Russia—will resent their exclusion and be driven into a coalition by the mere force of circumstances.

Where is there any peace? There is none in Ireland; there is none in Egypt; there is none in India. War is going on in Europe and Asia Minor. It never has stopped for one minute. The guns have never ceased to roar or the soldiers to march.

We have golden words about this new attempt to abolish war and to have mankind live according to the rules of right, but we had just exactly that a hundred years ago when the Holy Alliance was formed. Let me read from the document embracing some of its principles:

ART. I. Conformably to the words of the Holy Scriptures, which command all men to consider each other as brethren, the three contracting monarchs will remain united by the bonds of a true and indissoluble fraternity; and, considering each other as fellow countrymen, they will on all occasions and in all places lend each other aid and assistance, and regarding themselves toward their subjects and armies as fathers in the same spirit of fraternity with which they are animated to protect religion, peace, and justice.

Sweeter words were never penned. And the balance of the compact is along the same line. That Holy Alliance was joined by the King of Naples, by the King of France—Louis XVIII—by Ferdinand of Spain.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the whole of the compact of the Holy Alliance may be inserted at this point as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, leave will be granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

ART. I. Conformably to the words of the Holy Scriptures, which command all men to consider each other as brethren, the three contracting monarchs will remain united by the bonds of a true and indissoluble fraternity, and considering each other as fellow countrymen, they will, on all occasions and in all places, lend each other aid and assistance; and regarding themselves toward their subjects and armies as fathers in the same spirit of fraternity with which they are animated to protect religion, peace, and justice.

ART. II. In consequence, the sole principle of force, whether between the said Governments or between their subjects, shall be that of doing each other reciprocal service, and of testifying by unalterable good will and the mutual affection with which they ought to be animated, to consider themselves all as members of one and the same Christian Nation; the three allied princes looking on themselves as merely delegated by Providence to govern three branches of the one family—Austria, Prussia, and Russia—thus confessing that the Christian world, of which they and their people form a part, has in reality no other sovereign than Him to whom alone power really belongs, because in Him alone are found all the treasures of love, science, and infinite wisdom, that is to say God, our divine Saviour, the Word of the Most High, the Word of Life. Their majesties consequently recommend to their people, with the most tender solicitude, as the sole means of enjoying that peace which arises from a good conscience, and which alone is durable to strengthen themselves every day more and more in the principles and exercises of the duties which the Divine Saviour has taught to mankind.

ART. III. All the powers which shall choose solemnly to avow the sacred principles which have dictated the present act and shall acknowledge how important it is for the happiness of nations, too long agitated, that these truths should henceforth exercise over the destinies of mankind all the influence which belongs to them will be received with equal ardour and affection into this holy alliance.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. What was the result of that holy alliance? Let me sketch it briefly: First, they invaded Spain, overthrew the liberal constitution which Spain had adopted in 1819, and reestablished the absolute despotism of that infamous Ferdinand VII. They invaded Italy time and again, and beat down every attempt on the part of the Italians to obtain freedom of speech, freedom of the press, and free institutions.

Not content with having restored the Spanish king to his throne, they threatened to send armies and fleets to America, to reduce Central and South America again to the sway of the Spanish king. It was then that President Monroe, in February, 1822, issued his famous proclamation, the substance of which was, "You shall not interfere with American affairs"; the converse of the proposition being "We will not interfere with your affairs."

There are those who claim that George Canning was the author of the Monroe doctrine. Not at all. Madison, Jefferson, and Monroe had agreed upon it; and, as I said, the germ of it is in the Washington letter of 1795. By reason of that Monroe doctrine we expelled from Mexico the French Army, which had come to set up a Hapsburg, the Emperor Maximilian, and had held him up with those French bayonets, until the Civil War was closed. Then the President and Secretary of State invited the French to return home, and they returned.

So, Mr. President, I say these attempts by alliances to create a state of peace have never succeeded. This quadruple alliance will do no better than the quadruple alliance of 100 years ago. What have we gained by it except a vague, undefined responsibility which may draw us into the vortex of another world war. France has possessions in the Pacific second only to those of Great Britain. England, of course, wants to maintain her Empire there, in spite of the efforts of the Hindus to throw it off. Japan wants security for her encroachment upon the weaker peoples of the Orient. This gives her the opportunity.

I ask again, what do we get? It is said that we get security for the Philippines. If we keep our word we are going to turn them loose anyway. We are pledged to do it. We have been pledged to it ever since we broke the compact that Admiral Dewey made with Aguinaldo, by which compact he got the service of Aguinaldo and the Filipinos. We are in the attitude now of pledge breakers, people who break solemn treaties, after having got the benefit of them.

Some day we will have to grant those islands their independence. In other words, as honorable men conducting the affairs of an honorable Government, we will have to keep our word, as we do in private affairs.

We are told we get security for Hawaii. Very well, would it be worth the maintenance for an indefinite period of the vast armies which are taxing our people to death? Why should we not create a free State there, and give Japan to understand that she could not attack it else we would put against her movements on her flank in the East which would bear her down? Japan is going to do exactly what she thinks for her own interests, and her career shows it.

So, Mr. President, I merely wish to call attention to the vast advantages which the God of nature bestowed upon us, and which we are giving up in this four-power treaty.

Let us stand by the farewell address. Let us stand by the words of wisdom. Let us be content with the prosperity which has been ours under the historic purely American policies. Let us not embark, at this late day, into European intrigue, dynastic quarrels, disputes between emperors and kings, aristocracies and autocracies, involving our country in things which we do not understand and which we need not try to understand. Why should we? Let Europe and Japan attend to their own affairs, and let us attend to ours.

WORLD WAR FOREIGN DEBT COMMISSION.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, on Tuesday last, the 21st day of the present month, the President sent to the Senate the names of certain gentlemen to serve upon the commission created by the act approved February 9 last, including among them the Hon. REED SMOOT, a Member of this body, and the Hon. THEODORE BURTON, a Member of the House of Representatives. A resolution offered by myself this morning questioned the eligibility of the two gentlemen named to serve upon this commission in view of section 6 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States, which reads as follows:

No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States which shall have been created or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time.

While the purpose of this particular provision of the Constitution to be subverted by it or the evil to be repressed or avoided is sufficiently obvious perhaps from the reading of the section, I desire to advert to the history of this provision of the Constitution before the Constitutional Convention and some comments made by writers of the time upon the Constitution at the time of its adoption and immediately thereafter in reference thereto.

The history of the clause in question is reviewed in the eighth volume of the Federal Statutes Annotated, at page 129 and succeeding pages, as follows, after quoting the provision:

The provision here concerned is to be found in another form in the very early proceedings of the convention. The fourth and fifth resolutions of the Virginia plan in relation to the first and second branches, respectively, of the legislature each contained a clause upon the subject. That as to the first branch read that the members ought "to be ineligible to any office established by a particular State or under the authority of the United States, except those peculiarly belonging to the functions of the first branch, during the term of service and for the space of — after its expiration; to be incapable of reelection for the space of — after the expiration of their term of service, and to be subject to recall." That as to the second branch omitted the provisions incapacitating for reelection and as to being subject to recall, but was otherwise almost identical.

In the discussion of the provision as to the first branch the clauses making the members incapable of reelection and subject to recall were struck out in committee of the whole on June 12; the clause as to ineligibility was changed, and the whole was then reported from the committee to the convention in the following form:

"To be ineligible to any office established by a particular State, or under the authority of the United States (except those peculiarly belonging to the functions of the first branch), during the term of service, and, under the National Government, for the space of one year after its expiration."

In the House revision, on June 22 and 23, the subject was a good deal discussed and Members evidently thought it of much importance. Madison wanted to amend the provision so as to make members ineligible only to such offices as should be established or their emoluments increased during the member's term of service, but his motion was defeated. Some minor amendments were, however, carried and the clause was left to read: "to be ineligible to and incapable of holding any office under the authority of the United States (except those peculiarly belonging to the functions of the first branch) during the term of service of the first branch."

In the discussion in committee of the whole on June 12 of the like clause in relation to the second branch it was changed to read as the provision in regard to the first branch had been made to read by the committee of the whole, and in the House revision on June 26 it was further changed, and was left as follows: "to be ineligible to, and incapable of holding, any office under the authority of the United States (except those peculiarly belonging to the functions of the second branch) during the term for which they are elected, and for one year thereafter."

The two clauses were later referred to the committee of detail in the forms shown and were inserted by Randolph in the draft in almost the same words. The committee, however, later consolidated them into one clause, applying to both Houses, and then reported the following as the ninth section of the sixth article:

"The Members of each House shall be ineligible to, and incapable of holding, any office under the authority of the United States during the time for which they shall respectively be elected; and the Members of the Senate shall be ineligible to, and incapable of holding, any such office for one year afterwards."

This clause came up in the Convention on August 14 and was the subject of a lengthy discussion. Charles Pinckney thought it was degrading to Members to make them ineligible to offices. Their election, he said, showed that they had the confidence of the people, and it was his hope to see the Senate become a nursery of statesmen. He moved an amendment as follows: "The Members of each House shall be incapable of holding any office under the United States for which they, or any others for their benefit, receive any salary, fees, or emoluments of any kind, and the acceptance of such office shall vacate their seats, respectively." Mason ironically proposed to strike out the whole section, and suggested that "in the present state of American morals and manners, few friends will be lost to the plan by giving premiums to a mercenary and depraved ambition." Gouverneur Morris was opposed to the ineligibility, particularly as regards the officers of the Army and Navy, and thought it would only stimulate them to despise "those talking lords who dare not face the foe." Let this spirit be aroused at the end of a war," he went on, "before your troops shall have laid down their arms, and, though the civil authority be 'intrenched in parchment to the teeth,' they will cut their way to it." Finally Butler and Charles Pinckney moved to postpone until it should be seen what powers would be vested in the Senate, when it would be more easy to judge of the expediency of allowing the officers of state to be chosen out of that body, and this was carried.

This matter was not taken up again by the Convention, and consequently went to the Committee on Unfinished Portions, and they reported through Brearly on September 1 recommending that the following be substituted:

"The Members of each House shall be ineligible to any civil office under the authority of the United States during the time for which they shall respectively be elected; and no person holding an office under the United States shall be a Member of either House during his continuance in office."

When this was taken up in the Convention on September 3, Charles Pinckney again moved the substitute he had offered during the prior discussion. He was strenuously opposed to an absolute ineligibility and wanted to make it a mere incompatibility, so that they could accept the office, but that such acceptance should vacate their seats as Members; but his motion was defeated by a vote of eight States to two. King then moved to insert the word "created" before "during," so that Members should only be incapable of holding such offices as might be created during their term of service, and Williamson seconded the motion, as he did not see why Members should be ineligible to vacancies happening during their term. Sherman, Gerry, Randolph, and Mason were all in favor of the ineligibility and of at least as broad a provision as reported by the committee; while Gouverneur Morris, Gorham, Baldwin, and Charles Pinckney were in favor of King's amendment, or of a still further reduction of the ineligibility. King's amendment was lost by an evenly divided vote, and then the Convention adopted, by five States to four, an amendment of Williamson to insert before "during" the words "created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased." The last clause rendering any person holding an office under the United States incapable of being a Member of either House during his continuance in office was agreed to nem. con. The clause now reads:

"The Members of each House shall be ineligible to any civil office under the authority of the United States, created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased, during the time for which they shall respectively be elected. And no person, holding any office under the United States, shall be a Member of either House during his continuance in office."

In this form the matter was later referred to the committee on style, and they reported it as follows:

"No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office, under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased, during such time; and no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office."

On September 14, during the comparison of the report from the committee on style with the articles agreed on, Baldwin suggested that the language of the section did not extend to offices created by the Constitution, and the salaries of which would be created, not increased, by Congress at their first session. Hence Members of the first Congress might evade the disqualification. He was not seconded.

I read this report of the proceedings at length, Mr. President, for the purpose of showing how exceedingly important, in the judgment of the framers of our Government, was this particular provision of the Constitution. Likewise I call attention to the fact that an effort was made to restrict the ineligibility to those offices to which were attached some salary or other emolument, and an amendment of that character was defeated.

Mr. President, there can arise but one question under this provision of the Constitution, and that is whether the members of the commission to whom I have referred or any of the members of the commission hold an office under the authority of the United States within the meaning of the term as it is used in this provision of the Constitution. Let me recall to Senators the substance of the act. It provides:

That a World War foreign debt commission is hereby created consisting of five members, one of whom shall be the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall serve as chairman, and four of whom shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

It will be remembered that under the provisions of section 2 this commission is—authorized to refund or convert, and to extend the time of payment of the principal or the interest, or both, of any obligation of any foreign Government now held by the United States of America—and other obligations specified.

The authority granted by the act extends for the period of three years. It will be recalled that an effort was made to amend the bill in the course of its consideration, so that there should be reposed in the commission no authority finally to dispose of the questions with which they were called upon to deal, but under the provisions of which they would be required to report whatever arrangement they had made for ratification by either the Senate of the United States or by the Congress. That amendment, however, was defeated, and the law provides that whatever arrangement the commission may make for the refunding or conversion of these securities as provided in the act shall be final and conclusive.

Mr. President, the question is addressed to the Senate as to whether these commissioners hold office under the United States within the purview of the relevant provision of the Constitution. There are other provisions of the Constitution referring to offices under the authority of the United States or to officers exercising authority under the United States. This, I think, will shed some light upon the question as to whether commissioners such as these fall within the meaning of this particular provision of the Constitution.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, does the Senator think that the question of whether these appointees are to serve for any particular time or are to draw any salary would have any effect upon determining whether or not they occupy an office?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No. I shall call the attention of the Senate to a direct decision to the effect that the fact that appointees draw no salary does not affect the question as to whether or not they hold office under the United States, although in defining what is an office the textbooks often say that it embraces the idea of emolument. I might say in that connection that I take it that the word "embraces" means that it is broad enough to take in emoluments, though emoluments may not be an essential feature of the office.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The point I had in mind was whether the fact that they were merely temporary appointees to perform a particular service, brief in its nature and without compensation, would be a factor in determining the question?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I shall advert to that consideration in the course of my discussion. I ask the attention of the Senate, first, to the second clause of the first section of the second article of the Constitution, which reads as follows:

Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress; but no Senator or Representative or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States shall be appointed an elector.

Before I proceed, Mr. President, I perhaps ought to advert to the fact that the particular clause in question received brief consideration from the authors of the Federalist in two of their contributions to the discussion which generally passes under that name. It was adverted to in No. 52, the authorship of which is attributed by some to Madison and by others to Hamilton. The commentator was combating the proposition that the liberties of the people were imperiled by the new Constitution which it was proposed they should ratify. The author says:

Is it the danger apprehended from the other branches of the Federal Government? But where are the means to be found by the President, or the Senate, or both? Their emoluments of office, it is presumed, will not, and without a previous corruption of the House of Representatives can not, more than suffice for very different purposes; their private fortunes, as they must all be American citizens, can not possibly be sources of danger. The only means, then, which they can possess will be in the dispensation of appointments. Is it here that suspicion rests her charge? Sometimes we are told that this fund of corruption is to be exhausted by the President in subduing the virtue of the Senate. Now, the fidelity of the other House is to be the victim. The improbability of such a mercenary and perfidious combination of the several members of Government, standing on as different foundations as republican principles will well admit, and at the same time accountable to the society over which they are placed, ought alone to quiet this apprehension. But, fortunately, the Constitution has provided a still further safeguard. The Members of the Congress are rendered ineligible to any civil offices that may be created, or of which the emoluments may be increased, during the term of their election. No offices, therefore, can be dealt out to the existing Members but such as may become vacant by ordinary casualties; and to suppose that these would be sufficient to purchase the guardians of the people, selected by the people themselves, is to renounce every rule by which events ought to be calculated and to substitute an indiscriminate and unbounded jealousy with which all reasoning must be vain.

In No. 76, the author of which was undoubtedly Hamilton, occurs the following:

A man disposed to view human nature as it is, without either flattering its virtues or exaggerating its vices, will see sufficient ground of confidence in the probity of the Senate to rest satisfied, not only that it will be impracticable to the Executive to corrupt or seduce a majority of its Members, but that the necessity of its cooperation in the business of appointments will be a considerable and salutary restraint upon the conduct of that magistrate. Nor is the integrity of the Senate the only reliance. The Constitution has provided some important guards against the danger of Executive influence upon the legislative body; it declares that "No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the United States, which shall have been created or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time; and no person holding any office under the United States shall be a Member of either House during his continuance in office."

Rawle was one of the first commentators upon the Constitution whose work became standard. It was published in 1825. I read from pages 188 and 189 of that work:

The public officer being therefore considered with us as having actual living duties which he is bound to perform, and as having no more time than is necessary to perform them, the Constitution expressly excludes him from a seat. But a further caution is introduced into it. A Member of either House may be appointed to an office existing previously to his being elected, if the emoluments of it have not been increased during the time for which he was elected. But if a new office has been created, or the emoluments of an old one increased during that time, the promise or the chance of receiving an appointment to it may have an undue influence on his mind. Such an appointment is therefore forbidden by the Constitution during the time for which he was elected; and it is only to be regretted that it was not forbidden altogether. A dishonorable traffic in votes, should it ever become a characteristic of our country, would be more completely prevented if to an office so created, or rendered more profitable, no one who had had an agency in either respect could ever be appointed.

I read these matters, Mr. President, for the purpose of impressing upon the Senate the idea that there were two considerations inducing the inclusion of this provision in the Constitution. The first was so that offices should not be multiplied to be filled by the Members of Congress who voted for their creation. The second was so that the President might not constrain Members of Congress to his will concerning legislation by holding out to any of them the hope that they might be appointed to the offices thus to be created. In other words, it was a safeguard against Executive domination and control over either branch of Congress.

I proceed now, Mr. President, with the references to the other provisions of the Constitution that seem to me to shed some light upon the meaning of this particular provision.

I have heretofore read from the second clause of section 1 of Article II, which provides that—

No Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector.

Of course, the obvious purpose of that was this: The President of the United States, it was understood, would be likely to be a candidate for reelection; and it was feared that he might gain the adherence of members of the Electoral College, who were supposed to be entirely independent and free in their action, if the election went to one who had received an appointment from the President himself.

Accordingly, Mr. President, the question is presented to us as to whether any one of the commissioners appointed under the provisions of this act would be eligible to election as an elector of President and Vice President.

Another provision of the Constitution—perhaps most important in this connection—is that which gives to the President the appointive power, found in section 2 of Article II, as follows:

He—

That is, the President—

shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law.

The question is presented to us as to whether these commissioners are "other officers of the United States" whose appointment is to be confirmed by the Senate. Of course, the Senate, at the time it passed the act, must have deemed them so, because the act itself provides that they shall be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate; so it would appear that the Senate itself considered these commissioners as officers of the United States.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KELLOGG. The fact of confirmation itself does not make them officers. For instance, the President has often sent to the Senate names of men to negotiate treaties, and yet he would have the constitutional power to appoint Senators or Representatives without confirmation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, yes.

Mr. KELLOGG. So that the fact of their confirmation by the Senate does not make them officers. Does the Senator doubt that the Secretary of the Treasury could have been authorized to select men not appointed by the President to act with him in this case?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have not the slightest doubt in the world about it.

Mr. KELLOGG. Are they any more officers because the President appoints them than if the Secretary of the Treasury had appointed them? In that event, a Senator could have been appointed.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If there were no other question involved, if the question were to be determined upon that matter alone, the suggestion of the Senator might be entitled to some consideration.

I have invited your attention to this provision of the Constitution as strongly indicative of the sense of the Congress, at the time this act was passed, that these men are officers of the United States; but the same article, in the concluding section thereof, section 4, provides as follows:

The President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for and conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

That is to say, Mr. President, that it is only officers of the United States who can be removed from office by impeachment for high crimes and misdemeanors; so the question is directed to us as to whether, if any member of this commission should prove recreant to his duties, should be guilty of treason, felony, or other high crimes and misdemeanors, it would be possible for the House of Representatives to impeach him and whether the Senate would have jurisdiction to try him and remove him from office.

Mr. President, if these persons are not officers of the United States, subject to removal by impeachment, how could they be removed from office for dereliction of duty or for recreancy in the discharge of the duties reposed in them by Congress?

For instance, section 3 of the act provides that—

This act shall not be construed to authorize the exchange of bonds or other obligations of any foreign Government for those of any other foreign Government, or cancellation of any part of such indebtedness except through payment thereof.

Let us suppose that in total disregard of this plain provision of the statute the commission accepted, in lieu of the obligations due us from Italy, we will say, the bonds of Germany secured by Italy, pursuant to the reparations provisions of the Versailles treaty; or let us suppose that in the case of one of these countries they actually canceled a portion of the indebtedness: Would a member of the commission be subject to impeachment by the House of Representatives and trial by the Senate for such action upon his part; and, if not, what redress would the people of the United States have in the premises?

Let us go a little further.

The third clause of Article VI reads as follows:

The Senators and Representatives before mentioned, and the members of the several State legislatures, and all executive and judicial officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support this Constitution; but no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States.

Every executive and judicial officer of the United States is required to take an oath to support the Constitution. Is it required of these commissioners?

The fourteenth amendment to the Constitution provides:

No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress or elector of President and Vice President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath, as a Member of Congress or as an officer of the United States or as a member of any State legislature or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may by a vote of two-thirds of each House remove such disability.

Mr. President, it has been held by the Supreme Court of the United States that so insignificant an officer as a paymaster's clerk is an officer of the United States. Of course, there are a great many employees of the Government—stenographers, doorkeepers, messengers—who hold no office. They are simply employees; but a paymaster's clerk is held to be an officer. All of these are subject to the provisions of the Constitution to which I have invited your attention. A paymaster's clerk can not be an elector of President or Vice President. A paymaster's clerk must take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States. These officers may all be removed by impeachment. Is it true that the commissioners appointed pursuant to the provisions of this act are all exempt from these safeguarding provisions of the Constitution of the United States?

The subject which I am considering with you had very careful study in the House of Representatives by a committee of which, as my recollection serves me, ex-Speaker Henderson was the chairman. He at least submitted an elaborate report to the House of Representatives, in which he carefully considered this question as to whether members of commissions created by the action of either House or by an act of Congress are officers of the United States within the meaning of the provisions of the Constitution to which I have asked your attention. Although the report is somewhat lengthy, I deem it of such great importance in this connection that I venture to read most of it.

Mr. POMERENE. What is the Senator reading from?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I read from House Reports, Volume II, Miscellaneous Documents, Fifty-fifth Congress, being the report of the committee directed to inquire into the eligibility of Members of either House for appointment upon a commission to inquire into the advisability of annexing the Hawaiian Islands. They were held to be eligible in that proceeding for reasons which will appear as I read from the report filed.

While it may be admitted—

Said Mr. Henderson—

that all of the commissions, examining boards, regents, etc., considered by the committee do differ in many particulars as to their duties, still the legal principles involved in the consideration of this class of public servants apply to all of them, and therefore they will be considered together in discussing the law in respect to them.

It can not be contended that every position held by a Member of Congress is an office within the meaning of the Constitution, even though the term office may usually be applied to many of these positions. We are therefore led to an analysis and discussion of the word "office."

The chairman of a committee of Congress is in one sense an officer holding a position different from other members of the committee. Marks of honor and distinction are given to Members of Congress in many ways, but all incident to or growing out of their position as a Member of Congress. It is a mark of distinction to be selected as members of escorts to those of our number who die; designations are made of committees to notify the Senate and the President of certain matters. The mind will readily run over a list of many positions of trust and honor that are conferred upon Members of Congress where no pretense will be made that they are offices within the meaning of the Constitution.

In United States v. Hartwell (6 Wall., 393) it is laid down that "an office is a public station or employment conferred by the appointment of Government. The term embraces the ideas of tenure, duration, emolument, and duties."

That is to say, it embraces those. It need not necessarily include all of them. Some of them may be missing, but it is wide enough and broad enough to include those elements.

Elsewhere it is held that an office is "an employment on behalf of the Government, in any station or public trust, not merely transient, occasional, or incidental." (20 John Rep., 492, 7 Ohio State, 556.)

A careful consideration of all of the positions above referred to will show that they are merely transient, occasional, or incidental in their nature, and none of them possess the elements of duration, tenure, or emolument.

I pause here to remark, Mr. President, that that question came before the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of United States against Germane, my recollection is, in Ninety-eighth United States, which was the case of a contract surgeon. He was appointed by the Commissioner of Pensions to examine such applicants for pensions as the Commissioner of Pensions might direct to be examined, and he was to have a fee for each applicant examined. He had no place in which he carried on his work, but was an ordinary surgeon and physician in the city of Washington. He did not work regularly at the job but examined applicants as they came to him. It was held that that was a transient and not regular employment, so that it did not make him an officer. I continue reading:

All of these appointees were but instruments to procure detailed information.

I ask attention particularly to that remark:

All of these appointees were but instruments to procure detailed information for the better information and guidance of Congress and are wholly lacking in the essential elements of an office within the meaning of the Constitution.

"A public office is the right, authority, and duty, created and conferred by law, by which for a given period, either fixed by law or enduring at the pleasure of the creating power, an individual is invested with some portion of the sovereign functions of the Government to be exercised by him for the benefit of the public." (Mechem's Public Offices and Officers, sec. 1; Matter of Hathaway, 71 N. Y., 238-243; 3 Greenleaf (Me.), 481; Public Officers, Throop, sec. 6; Olmstead v. The Mayor, etc., 42 N. Y. Sup. Ct., 481.)

It has been held that these functions must be either legislative, executive, or judicial, and that to constitute the person an officer he must have conferred upon him either legislative, executive, or judicial powers. (Mechem's Public Offices, etc., sec. 4, and cases cited.)

Says the author:

"Sec. 4. Office involves delegation of sovereign functions. The most important characteristic which distinguishes an office from an employment or contract is that the creation and conferring of an office involves a delegation to the individual of some of the sovereign functions of government, to be exercised by him for the benefit of the public; that some portion of the sovereignty of the country, either legislative, executive, or judicial, attaches, for the time being, to be exercised for the public benefit. Unless the powers conferred are of this nature, the individual is not a public officer."

This involves necessarily the power (1) to legislate, or (2) execute law, or (3) hear and determine judicially questions submitted.

Therefore mere power to investigate some particular subject and report thereon, or to negotiate a treaty of peace, or on some commercial subject, and report without power to make binding on the Government, does not constitute a person an officer.

That, Mr. President, I think is the test. Some time ago the President was moved to appoint the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to represent the Government of the United States in the Limitation of Armaments Conference in session in this city. That was to result, if it was to be successfully worked, in a treaty or treaties, which treaty or treaties were to be submitted to the Senate for ratification. They had no power except to carry on negotiations and report the same to the President of the United States and to the Senate for such action as they might take with respect to the same. They were invested with no power to conclude anything, to make any kind of a treaty, but simply to carry on the preliminary negotiations which were to be submitted to the President and to the Senate as I have stated.

In this matter, of course, the situation is entirely different. Whatever authority and power is given to these commissioners they exercise, and when they have performed their duties the work will be done.

Mr. Henderson continued:

Again, the employment must not be merely transient, occasional, or incidental.

I have adverted to that heretofore. He continued:

In United States v. Hartwell (6 Wall., 385) the court held that the term public office embraces the idea of tenure, duration, emolument, and duties, and that the duties were continuing and permanent, not occasional or temporary.

In United States v. Germaine (99 U. S. Sup. Ct., 508) the question of who is or who is not a public officer was again up, and the court said:

"If we look to the nature of defendant's employment, we think it equally clear that he is not an officer. In that case (referring to United States v. Hartwell) the court said the term embraces the ideas of tenure, duration, emolument, and duties, and that the latter were continuing and permanent, not occasional or temporary. In the case before us the duties are not continuing and permanent, and they are occasional and intermittent. * * * He is required to keep no place of business for the public use. He gives no bond and takes no oath, unless by some order of the Commissioner of Pensions of which we are not advised. * * * He is but an agent of the commissioner, appointed by him, and removable by him at his pleasure, to procure information needed to aid in the performance of his own official duties. * * * There is no penalty for his absence from duty or refusal to perform, except his loss of the fee in the given case."

The duties of the commissioners appointed under the statutes (to which attention will be called) are not continuing or permanent; they have no place of business for the public use, or even for their own use; they give no bond and take no oath. In fact, they are mere agents appointed by direction of Congress for the purpose of gathering information and making recommendations for its use if the Congress sees fit to avail itself of the labors of the commission. The commissioners appointed under these statutes or resolutions can not be compelled to attend or act, and in the broadest sense they are mere agents of the Congress. These commissioners are not to execute any standing laws which are the rules of action and the guardians of rights, nor have they the right or power to make any such law, nor can they interpret or enforce any existing law.

Under a statute of Maine the governor was authorized "to appoint one or more agents for the preservation of timber on the public lands, and for other purposes," and the judges held that these agents were not a civil office of profit under the State, although they were entitled to compensation. (See 3 Greenleaf Reports (Me.), p. 481.)

In United States v. Hendee (124 U. S., 309) it was held that a paymaster's clerk in the Navy is an officer of the Navy, and in United States v. Mount (124 U. S., 303) it was held that such paymaster's clerk, appointed by a paymaster in the Navy, with the approval of the Secretary of the Navy, is not an officer of the Navy in the sense that he is an officer of the United States.

The constitution of the State of New York, 1846, article 6, section 8, prohibits the judges of the court of appeals and justices of the supreme court from exercising any power of appointment to public office.

Section 16, chapter 280, laws of 1847, conferred upon the chancellor power to issue a commission to some person empowering him to act as a surrogate in a particular case when by reason of statutory disqualifications the officers designated to act could not do so. It was contended that such person when designated to act as surrogate became a public officer, inasmuch as for the time being and in the matter before whom he was to act as a judicial officer with full power to hear, try, and determine the particular case, but the court of appeals in Matter of Hathaway (71 N. Y., 238) held:

"The term 'public office,' as used in the Constitution, has respect to a permanent public trust or employment, to be exercised generally and in all proper cases. It does not include the appointment, to meet special exigencies, of an individual to perform transient, occasional, or incidental duties, such as are ordinarily performed by public officers; as to such appointments the legislature is left untrammelled, and at liberty to invest the courts with power to make them." (Church, Ch. J., Andrews and Miller, JJ., dissenting.)

In Hall v. State (39 Wis., 79, chap. 40, laws of 1857) (the law) appointed certain named persons "commissioners to make a geological, mineralogical, and agricultural survey of the State," and provided that such commissioners should arrange and distribute the functions of such survey by mutual agreement. The law provided a salary and provided for filling vacancies, and gave the governor authority to remove any member for incompetency or neglect of duty. The court held that these commissioners were officers. The court said:

"The geological survey commissioners were appointed directly by legislature; no specific term of office was fixed (except by the governor, whose power to do so may well be doubted); provision was made by law for removing them for cause and for filling vacancies; their salaries were paid out of the State treasury, and their functions were not of merely private, local, or temporary concern, but related to the material and permanent interests of the whole State. The duty imposed upon them was an important public trust, to be exercised for the benefit of all the people of the State, and could only be discharged properly by gentlemen of high attainments in physical science,

* * * It may safely be asserted that any person charged by law with the performance of public functions affecting the general interests of society, especially if he be elected thereto by the people or appointed directly by the legislature, and who receives his compensation out of the Public Treasury, is a public officer, and as such can have no vested right in his office, unless secured by the Constitution. * * * It may be difficult to draw the exact line between an officer and a mere service or employment; but, as already observed, when public functions are conferred by law upon certain persons elected by the people or appointed by the legislature, if those functions concern the general interests of the State, and are not of a nature merely local or temporary, such persons are public officers, especially if they are paid a salary for their services out of the Public Treasury."

Mr. President, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations is desirous of getting up a measure for consideration this afternoon, and is desirous that I should yield for that purpose. I am very anxious to accommodate him, but it was rather agreed this morning that the resolution to which I am addressing myself should provide that the Judiciary Committee should report on the question by Tuesday morning, and accordingly I am desirous of submitting these matters, so that the committee shall have them for consideration at as early a time as possible; so I want to conclude. I said to the Senator from Wyoming, however, that if an agreement could be made to take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning, and allow me to conclude my remarks then, I should be very glad to yield to him at this time.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana is very considerate in the matter, and I shall be very glad to move to go into legislative session in order to enable the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] to call up the Interior Department appropriation bill, which ought to be disposed of, and after the legislative session to-day I shall certainly make a motion to take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow, leaving the Senator from Montana in possession of the floor.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield, then, to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate return to legislative session.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no objection to the Senate returning to legislative session, but I do not want to have anything else taken up, so as to disturb the unfinished business, if I can help it.

Mr. LODGE. There is no intention of disturbing the unfinished business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will lay the unfinished business before the Senate.

AMENDMENT OF RAILROAD VALUATION ACT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 539) to further amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhulse, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 2265) to regulate marine insurance in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 137) transferring to the custody of the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution certain relics now in the possession of the Department of State.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

- S. 160. An act for the relief of Kristina Furjak;
- S. 621. An act to amend subdivisions (a) and (c) of section 206 of the transportation act, 1920;
- S. 982. An act for the relief of Louisa Frow;
- S. 1951. An act for the relief of John Hickson, jr.;
- S. 2736. An act providing for the conveyance of certain unused military reservations in the State of Massachusetts to the city of Salem and the town of Marblehead;
- H. R. 7483. An act for the relief of Robert G. Whitfield;
- H. R. 8924. An act to amend the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes," approved March 30, 1920; and
- H. R. 9060. An act to authorize the Secretary of War to lease a certain tract of land to the city of Leavenworth, in the State of Kansas.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 10329, the Department of the Interior appropriations bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 10329) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. WARREN. I make the usual request that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the bill may be read for amendment, the committee amendments to be first considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The Assistant Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the items for contingent expenses, Department of the Interior, page 4, line 10, to strike out "$58,000" and insert "$66,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 19, to strike out "$75,000" and insert "$85,000," so as to read:

For stationery, including tags, labels, index cards, cloth-lined wrappers, and specimen bags, printed in the course of manufacture, and such printed envelopes as are not supplied under contracts made by the Postmaster General, for the department and its several bureaus and offices, $85,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 5, to strike out "$75,000" and insert "$85,000," so as to read:

and said sums so deducted shall be credited to and constitute, together with the first-named sum of $85,000, the total appropriation for stationery for the department and its several bureaus and offices for the fiscal year 1923.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 5, after the word "Building," to insert "including the power, heating, and lighting plant therein," and in line 7, after the word "therefor," to insert "together with all the machinery, tools, equipment, and supplies used, or for use, in connection therewith," so as to read:

The responsibility for the care, maintenance, and protection of the Interior Department Building, the Pension Office Building, the Patent Office Building, and the General Land Office Building, including the power, heating, and lighting plant therein, and the disbursement of the funds appropriated therefor, together with all the machinery, tools, equipment, and supplies used, or for use, in connection therewith, shall be transferred on July 1, 1922, and thereafter, from the Secretary of the Interior to the superintendent of the State, War, and Navy Department Buildings.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, line 9, after the word "lights," to insert "power," so as to make the paragraph read:

For fuel, lights, power, repairs, window washing, miscellaneous items, printing, city directory, and telephone service for Interior Department, $77,000.

Mr. WARREN. I will ask that the amendments with reference to the surveyor general's office be passed over for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. They will be passed over as requested.

The reading of the bill was continued.

The next amendment was, in the items for the General Land Office, on page 15, line 4, to strike out "$372,000" and insert "$400,000," so as to read:

Registers and receivers: For salaries and commissions of registers of district land offices and receivers of public moneys at district land offices, at not exceeding $3,000 per annum each, $400,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 18, after the name "Eureka, Calif.," to insert "Vancouver and Seattle, Wash.," so as to make the additional proviso read:

Provided further, That, with the exception of the land offices mentioned in the last preceding proviso, and also the land offices at Eureka, Calif., Vancouver and Seattle, Wash., and Burns, Oreg., and where the land office shall be the only remaining land office in any State, no money herein appropriated shall be expended for the maintenance of any land office, other than as is provided in this paragraph, in a land district having public land area of less than 100,000 acres, or whose cost of maintenance shall exceed 33½ per cent of the revenues of the office for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator whether the increases noted on this page result from increasing the number of offices?

Mr. WARREN. Not at all. It is work in the offices that has increased. There is not an increase of an employee.

Mr. KING. I did not hear the Senator's statement.

Mr. WARREN. It does not increase the number of officers or the amount they receive. It is merely to take care of the work of the office and keep it current.

Mr. KING. Was not the House advised as to the necessity?

Mr. WARREN. The House did not seem to agree with the Land Office officials and did not give them the amount of the Budget estimate. On consideration by the Senate committee it was perfectly plain that the House had erred and that the Senate should come to their aid to that extent.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator what amount the bill carries in excess of the amount carried by the bill as it passed the House?

Mr. WARREN. About 1 per cent or a trifle over 1 per cent; in other words, about $3,000,000 altogether.

Mr. KING. More than the House provided?

Mr. WARREN. More than the House provided.

Mr. KING. Generally speaking, how do the items for the various departments carried in the bill compare with the items for the same departments, bureaus, and divisions for the present fiscal year?

Mr. WARREN. Let me say to the Senator that this is the state of affairs. Nearly every item is below or the same. I do not remember now of a single item that is more, although there may be some. There is not a single place in the bill where we have exceeded the estimate of the Budget. There is not a single increase in salary, so far as that is concerned, in the bill. It carries less than the amount appropriated last year, and less than the estimates for last year or this year.

Mr. KING. It seemed to me in running through the bill that some of the amounts are in excess of the sums carried in the last appropriation act for the same service.

Mr. WARREN. There possibly might be, although I do not recall any. My clerk refreshes my recollection that there is scarcely any, if any, but there was a quite general scaling down made by the House of all estimates. The Senate committee noted all of those cuts and called no one before us except those who felt aggrieved. When they came before us we told them that we had the evidence given before the House committees and asked them not to repeat it. We asked them if they could not get along with the House allowances, and in almost all instances they said they could, but there were some items where the necessity for increases was very evident.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator whether there has been any cut in the number of employees in the Interior Department and in the other agencies of the Government for which the bill carries appropriations?

Mr. WARREN. Some, perhaps; but so far as the Land Office is concerned, in the Interior Department, the work of that office has been very much increased, as the Senator knows, in the last few years. They have not been very materially decreased.

Mr. KING. The bill carries the appropriation for the Indian Bureau?

Mr. WARREN. It does.

Mr. KING. That is, the items which in the past constituted the Indian appropriation bill?

Mr. WARREN. That is correct.

Mr. KING. May I inquire in respect to those items?

Mr. WARREN. The estimates in nearly every case were less.

Mr. KING. Less than they were for the present fiscal year?

Mr. WARREN. Yes. They were very satisfactory in this way, that the bureau went before the Budget officers—in fact, the commissioner himself went—and struggled through the matter with the Budget officers and concluded, almost in every instance, to take the estimate of the Budget. He asked us to change some of the language in different places and to add a few increases. In one or two cases, for instance, where buildings have burned down since the House committee had passed on the bill—I think in two cases schools have burned down—we have provided for those.

Mr. KING. The fact is, then, that the bill as it came from the House was less than the recommendation from the Budget?

Mr. WARREN. It was less than the Budget estimates.

Mr. KING. Has the Senator in mind the reductions from the recommendations of the Budget?

Mr. WARREN. They are almost all general. Of course, if the Senator wishes the items, he has the report of the House committee on the bill, which gives the status of every item.

Mr. KING. To save further inquiry, which I would be compelled to make at a later point, may I inquire of the Senator whether there was any purpose to include any new projects for reclamation, or was it the view that the matter would be taken care of in the McNary bill?

Mr. WARREN. In fact, the House unceremoniously reduced the reclamation projects below the estimates and below the amount that was expected to be realized from land sales, oil royalties, and so forth. We have raised them to the Budget estimates because it takes not a dollar out of the Treasury. It simply takes whatever money is received from the oil royalties and from the sale of lands and divides it among the different projects, and even if we should add $10,000,000 to it in this way it would not add one dollar to the moneys to be taken directly from the Treasury.

Mr. KING. What I wanted to ask the Senator was this: In view of the fact that there have been no new reclamation projects for so long, did not the committee feel justified in recommending appropriations, or was not the committee impressed with the need for making provision for new ones?

Mr. WARREN. That has not been done here. We had before us an amendment offered by a Senator providing for $20,000,000, but we did not feel we could offer it because it was legislation.

Mr. KING. The opinion of the committee then was that that would be new legislation, which they were not authorized to put on the bill?

Mr. WARREN. It undoubtedly would be new legislation.

Mr. KING. And therefore any amendment to the bill asking for a new project—

Mr. WARREN. It would have to be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. KING. It would be subject to a point of order?

Mr. WARREN. It would.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 15, line 26, after "1922," to strike out the additional proviso in the following words:

And provided further, That the land office at Springfield, Mo., and the offices of register and receiver thereat are hereby abolished.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 17, line 2, to strike out "$485,000," and to insert "$550,000," so as to read:

Depredations on public timber, protecting public lands, and settlement of claims for swamp land and swamp-land indemnity: For protecting timber on the public lands, and for the more efficient execution of the law and rules relating to the cutting thereof; of protecting public lands from illegal and fraudulent entry or appropriation, and of adjusting claims for swamp lands, and indemnity for swamp lands, including not exceeding $15,000 for clerical services in bringing up and making current the work of the General Land Office, $550,000, including not exceeding $35,000 for the purchase of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles for the use of agents and others employed in the field service and for operation, maintenance, and exchange of same and for operation and maintenance of a motor boat.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 19, line 7, to increase the appropriation for surveying public lands, from $600,000 to $700,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 43, line 24, after the word "available," to insert "and to remain available until expended," so as to read:

For enlarging and repairing canals, repairing structures and dam, and replacement of structures of the irrigation system for the irrigation of lands on the Fort Hall Reservation, Idaho, and lands ceded by the Indians of said reservation, $300,000, to be immediately available and to remain available until expended, the total cost of the work to be done on this project not to exceed $760,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 45, line 9, to strike out "$166,000" and to insert "$184,000," so as to make the paragraph read:

For support and education of 750 Indian pupils at the Indian school, Haskell Institute, Lawrence, Kans., and for pay of superintendents, $150,000; for general repairs and improvements, $14,000; for addition to heating and power plant, $20,000, to be immediately available; in all, $184,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 47, after line 8, to insert:

The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to withdraw from the Treasury of the United States, in his discretion, the sum of $46,570, or so much thereof as may be necessary of the principal sum on deposit to the credit of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota arising under section 7 of the act of January 14, 1889, and to expend the same for payment of tuition for Chippewa Indian children enrolled in the public schools of the State of Minnesota: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may make payments therefrom of such amounts as he deems proper and just in aid of public schools of the State of Minnesota which have enrolled Chippewa Indian children therein during the fiscal year 1922, and in excess of the rate of compensation fixed in any existing contracts with public school districts, where such rate is inadequate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 48, after line 21, to insert:

For salaries and expenses of the commission to be appointed under the provisions of section 2 of the act of May 23, 1908 (35 Stat. L., pp. 268-271), $2,500, to be paid from the principal sum on deposit to the credit of the Chippewa Indians arising under the act entitled "An act for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota," approved January 14, 1889 (25 Stat. L., p. 642).

Mr. WARREN. I send to the desk an amendment to the committee amendment which I offer at this point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 48, line 25, after "$2,500," insert the words "to be immediately available."

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, what are the functions or the duties of this commission?

Mr. WARREN. It is the old law which I think the Senator remembers. They have the general oversight of the rights of the Indians, preservation of timber, and so forth, I believe. It has been going on for a number of years.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 50, after line 9, to insert:

The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to expend $3,632.92 from funds held by the United States in trust for the Flathead Tribe of Indians in the payment of $2,250 due Swan Johnson on a logging contract and $851 and $531.92, respectively, due Agnes and Paul Antoine, Flathead Indians, for stumpage.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 53, line 15, to insert "for dining room and kitchen, $20,000," and in line 16 to strike out "$90,000" and insert "$110,000," so as to make the paragraph read:

For support and education of 400 Indian pupils at the Indian school at Carson City, Nev., including pay of superintendent, $80,000; for general repairs and improvements, $10,000; for dining room and kitchen, $20,000; in all, $110,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 54, after line 4, to insert:

The Secretary of the Interior is authorized, by agreement or otherwise, to bring 4,887 acres of Paiute Indian lands in the State of Nevada within the provisions and benefits of a drainage district, organized pursuant to the laws of said State, for the purpose of draining the lands within the Newlands irrigation project; and there is hereby appropriated the sum of $2,500 for the purpose of paying the first installment assessable against said Indian lands: Provided, That the total amount of the charges assessed against said Indian lands shall not exceed $49,603.05, and shall be payable in 20 annual installments: Provided further, That the Indian lands so drained by said district shall not be amenable to any lien which is subject to foreclosure created by the laws of said State for failure to pay charges when due: And provided further, That the money herein appropriated shall be reimbursed in accordance with such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 55, line 10, to insert "for construction of a gymnasium and an assembly hall, including equipment for both buildings, to replace the building destroyed by fire February 12, 1922, to be immediately available, $45,000," and in line 13 to strike out "$109,000" and insert "$154,000," so as to make the paragraph read:

For support and education of 500 Indian pupils at the Indian school at Albuquerque, N. Mex., and for pay of superintendent, $100,000; for general repairs and improvements, $9,000; for construction of a gymnasium and an assembly hall, including equipment for both buildings, to replace the building destroyed by fire February 12, 1922, to be immediately available, $45,000; in all, $154,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent that the Secretary may correct all totals as may be necessary from time to time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 62, line 8, after the word "pupil," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the Osage Boarding School may be continued, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, for a period not exceeding six years from July 1, 1922, and that the limit of $300 allowed per capita shall not apply to such school for the present fiscal year.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 64, line 14, after the word "prescribe," to insert the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That hereafter no money shall be expended from tribal funds belonging to the Five Civilized Tribes without specific appropriation by Congress, except as follows: Equalization of allotments, per capita and other payments authorized by law to individual members of the respective tribes, tribal and other Indian schools under existing law, salaries and contingent expenses of governors, chiefs, assistant chiefs, secretaries, interpreters, and mining trustees of the tribes at salaries at the rate heretofore paid, and one attorney each for the Choctaw, Chickasaw, and Creek Tribes employed under contract approved by the President, under existing law.

The next amendment was, on page 104, after line 24, to insert "for labor and material necessary for installation of sewer, garbage disposal, and water-supply system in the park, to be immediately available, $38,878.10; in all, $45,378.10," so as to make the paragraph read:

General Grant National Park, Calif.: For administration, protection, maintenance, and improvement, $6,500; for labor and material necessary for installation of sewer, garbage disposal, and water-supply system in the park, to be immediately available, $38,878.10; in all, $45,378.10.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 105, line 12, to strike out "$80,000" and to insert "$93,200"; in line 14, to strike out "$50,000" and to insert "$100,000"; and, in line 17, to strike out "$150,000" and to insert "$213,200," so as to make the paragraph read:

Glacier National Park, Mont.: For administration, protection, and maintenance, including necessary repairs to the roads from Glacier Park Station through the Blackfoot Indian Reservation to various points in the boundary line of the Glacier National Park and to the International Boundary, including not exceeding $3,000 for the purchase, maintenance, repair, and operation of motor-driven and horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles for the use of the superintendent and employees in connection with general park work, $93,200; for continued construction of the transmountain road, connecting the east and west sides of the park, $100,000; for miscellaneous construction of physical improvements, including not exceeding $10,000 for completion of gravity water supply at administrative headquarters, $20,000; in all, $213,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading clerk read down to line 23, page 105, as follows:

Grand Canyon National Park, Ariz.: For administration, protection, and maintenance, including not exceeding $2,000 for the purchase, maintenance, operation, and repair of motor-driven passenger-carrying vehicles for the use of the superintendent and employees in connection with general park work, $48,000.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, I have carefully noted the appropriations for Grand Canyon National Park, Ariz. If there is one thing which I do know about, it is that section of the country. In the Grand Canyon there was first established a forest reserve.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will permit me, he is now referring to a part of the House text. Will he reserve his remarks until we finish consideration of the amendments proposed by the committee to the bill, and then we may come back to the item in which the Senator is interested?

Mr. CAMERON. Very well. I thank the Senator.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 106, line 1, before the words "ranger station," to insert "including not to exceed $3,000 for"; after line 2, to insert "for labor and material necessary for insect-control work on the north rim of the Grand Canyon, to be immediately available, $2,500," so as to read:

Grand Canyon National Park, Ariz.: For administration, protection, and maintenance, including not exceeding $2,000 for the purchase, maintenance, operation, and repair of motor-driven passenger-carrying vehicles for the use of the superintendent and employees in connection with general park work, $48,000; for completion of Hermit Rim Road, for partial construction of new trail from South Rim to new suspension bridge, for reconstruction Kaibab trail, and including not to exceed $3,000 for ranger station and community center for campers at headquarters, $40,000; for labor and material necessary for insect-control work on the north rim of the Grand Canyon, to be immediately available, $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 106, line 5, to increase the total appropriation for the Grand Canyon National Park from $88,000 to $90,500.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I think there is a misapprehension on the part of the chairman of the committee in regard to the object which the Senator from Arizona has in view. He wants to object, as I understand, to the appropriation as an entirety and if the amendments are agreed to now that opportunity will not be afforded.

Mr. WARREN. Let me say to the Senator that the $48,000 item is a part of the House text. The amendment which has last been read is a committee amendment, and of course the Senator from Arizona may address himself to that if he wishes so to do. The Senator understands that unanimous consent was given to consider first the committee amendments. The amendment which has just been stated is, of course, open to amendment.

Mr. McNARY. I appreciate that, and at this point I think the Senator from Arizona could properly bring up the matter he has in mind.

Mr. CAMERON. Does the Senator from Wyoming have reference to the $40,000 item?

Mr. WARREN. I have reference to the amendment on page 106, beginning in line 3. At the earnest solicitation of the superintendent of parks, we put that amendment in to try to save the timber against insects, the appropriation being $2,500.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment on page 106, line 5, striking out "$88,000" and inserting "$90,500."

Mr. WARREN. The amendment on page 106, line 5, striking out "$88,000" and inserting "$90,500," of course, embraces the total of the items in the paragraph, and includes everything that goes to the Grand Canyon National Park.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, I object to the whole proposition, and I hope if opportunity is not afforded to speak on it now that I may have some time later. I should like to have it passed over temporarily, if I can not have the opportunity to speak at the present time.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that the last amendment may be passed over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 107, line 16, to strike out "$13,000" and to insert "$21,000"; in line 17, to strike out "$3,000" and to insert "including not to exceed $19,200 for reconstruction and improvement of about 4 miles of entrance road, $22,200"; and in line 19, to strike out "$16,000" and to insert "$43,200," so as to make the paragraph read:

Mesa Verde National Park, Colo.: For administration, protection, and maintenance, including not exceeding $2,400 for purchase, maintenance, operation, and repair of horse-drawn and motor-driven passenger-carrying vehicles for use of the superintendent and employees, $21,000; for construction of physical improvements, including not to exceed $19,200 for reconstruction and improvement of about 4 miles of entrance road, $22,200; in all, $43,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 108, line 3, to strike out "$38,000" and to insert "$46,000"; line 4, to insert "for completion widening 3 miles of the Nisqually Glacier to Paradise Valley Road, $45,000"; and in line 8 to strike out "$77,000" and to insert "$130,000," so as to make the paragraph read:

Mount Rainier National Park, Wash.: For administration, protection, and maintenance, including not exceeding $1,800 for the purchase, maintenance, operation, and repair of motor-driven passenger-carrying vehicles for use of the superintendent and park employees in connection with general park work, $46,000; for completion Carbon River Road, $36,000; for completion widening 3 miles of the Nisqually Glacier to Paradise Valley Road, $45,000; for four winter patrol cabins, $2,000; for miscellaneous construction physical improvements, $1,000; in all, $130,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 108, line 20, to strike out "$39,000" and to insert "$53,000," and in line 21 to strike out "$59,900" and to insert "$73,900," so as to make the paragraph read:

Rocky Mountain National Park, Colo.: For administration, protection, and maintenance, including not exceeding $2,400 for the purchase, maintenance, operation, and repair of motor-driven passenger-carrying vehicles for use of the superintendent and employees in connection with general park work, $53,000; for construction of physical improvements, $20,900; in all, $73,900.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 109, line 3, to strike out "$25,000" and to insert "$50,000"; in line 6 to strike out "$5,500" and to insert "$9,000; for labor and material necessary for installation of sewer, garbage disposal, and water-supply system in the park, to be immediately available, $54,706.20"; and in line 9 to strike out "$87,500" and to insert "$145,706.20," so as to make the paragraph read:

Sequoia National Park, Calif.: For administration, protection, and maintenance, including not exceeding $2,000 for the purchase, maintenance, operation, and repair of motor-driven passenger-carrying vehicles for the use of the superintendent and employees in connection with general park work, $32,000; for continued construction Middle Fork Road, $50,000; for construction storehouse, bunkhouse, two quarters for employees at permanent headquarters on Middle Fork at Alder Creek, and miscellaneous new construction, $9,000; for labor and material necessary for installation of sewer, garbage disposal, and water-supply system in the park, to be immediately available, $54,706.20; in all, $145,706.20.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 109, line 22, to increase the appropriation for construction of physical improvements in Yellowstone National Park, Wyo., from "$80,000" to "$80,800."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 112, line 19, to strike out "$95,000" and to insert "$100,000"; and in line 22 to strike out "$9,000" and insert "$10,000," so as to read:

COLUMBIA INSTITUTION FOR THE DEAF.

For support of the institution, including salaries and incidental expenses, books and illustrative apparatus, and general repairs and improvements, $100,000.

For repairs to buildings of the institution, including plumbing and steam fitting, and for repairs to pavements within the grounds, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMERENE subsequently said: Mr. President, if I may have the attention of the Senator from Wyoming for a moment, on page 112 certain amendments have been agreed to, as I am advised, relative to the appropriation for the Columbia Institution for the Deaf. In addition to the two amendments which have been agreed to, as a member of the board of directors, I asked the Committee on Appropriations to include another amendment which provided for an expenditure of $12,000 for the purchase of 6.2 acres of land. I have that amendment before me. In view of the fact that the Senator asked me one or two questions in regard to it which I was unable to answer at least satisfactorily to myself, I wonder if the Senator will not consent to have that amendment adopted if I offer it now, with the understanding that if after the matter goes into conference there is any objection to it I shall not insist upon it?

Mr. WARREN. Let me say to the Senator that I would not be able to do that, because all members of the committee in considering the item were opposed to it, and I would not feel that I had the right to let it go in now. It appears to me that the price proposed to be paid is large for a small parcel of land.

Mr. POMERENE. I do not think that it is too large for the amount of land, but at the same time I realize fully that the committee is giving its best thought to these matters.

Mr. WARREN. The institution has, as I understand, one hundred and thirty-odd acres there already.

Mr. POMERENE. If the committee as a whole feels that way about it, I shall not insist upon the amendment.

Mr. WARREN. That was the feeling of the committee.

Mr. POMERENE. Very well.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in the items for Freedmen's Hospital, on page 114, line 7, to strike out "$70,000" and to insert "$77,535," so as to make the paragraph read:

For subsistence, fuel and light, clothing, bedding, forage, medicine, medical and surgical supplies, surgical instruments, electric lights, repairs, replacement of X-ray apparatus, furniture, motor-propelled ambulance, and other absolutely necessary expenses, $77,535.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 114, line 8, to strike out "$111,020" and to insert "$118,555," so as to read: "Total, Freedmen's Hospital, $118,555."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the items for the Territory of Alaska, on page 114, line 18, to insert "for renovating furniture, draperies, etc., and purchase of new furniture and equipment for executive mansion, and painting and decorating interior of the building"; and in line 21, to strike out "$7,500" and to insert "$12,000," so as to make the paragraph read:

For incidental and contingent expenses, clerk hire, not to exceed $2,500; janitor service for the governor's office and the executive mansion, not to exceed $1,200; traveling expenses of the governor while absent from the capital on official business; repair and preservation of executive mansion and furniture and for care of grounds; stationery, lights, water, and fuel; for renovating furniture, draperies, etc., and purchase of new furniture and equipment for executive mansion, and painting and decorating interior of the building; in all, $12,000, to be expended under the direction of the governor.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 116, line 3, to strike out "$1,400,000" and to insert "$1,662,000," so as to make the paragraph read:

For expenses of maintenance and operation of railroads in the Territory of Alaska (in excess of revenues), $1,662,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 116, after line 10, to insert:

Authority is granted to purchase during the fiscal year 1923 from the appropriation made for the construction and operation of railroads in Alaska, articles and supplies for sale to employees and contractors, the appropriation to be reimbursed by the proceeds of such sales.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 116, after line 15, to insert:

During the fiscal year 1923 there shall be covered into the appropriation established from time to time under the act entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to locate, construct, and operate railroads in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes," approved March 12, 1914, as amended, the proceeds of the sale of material utilized for temporary work and structures in connection with the operations under said act, as well as the sales of all other condemned property which has been purchased or constructed under the provisions thereof; also any moneys refunded in connection with the construction and operations under said act, and a report hereunder shall be made to Congress at the beginning of its next session.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The committee amendments, except those passed over, are completed.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I wish to call attention to the last two items. While they are in separate paragraphs, I wish them marked so that they may be taken as only one paragraph, and given one number in the copy of the bill with Senate amendments numbered that is made up for conference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. They were read as one, and so considered.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I desire to call attention to the items on page 13 of the bill for clerical hire in the various surveyors' offices.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the first amendment passed over.

Mr. PHIPPS. In the consideration of these items, I think from reading the House hearings that the committee was misled and used a table showing comparisons of surveys made, thinking that it related to the entire activities of these various offices, whereas it related only to mineral surveys and locations, which constitute only a part of the work. The estimates for this particular service for clerk hire had been materially reduced in the various offices under the amounts in the bill for the current year. The House made further very drastic reductions in the amounts estimated for and which were approved by the Budget Committee. Therefore I am going to move that the following corrections be made, which will have the effect of restoring the figures of the Budget.

Mr. WARREN. A motion made to conform to the figures of the Budget would be all right to make. I wish to say, Mr. President, regarding that, that the Commissioner of the General Land Office, who has charge of that matter, appeared before the committee and fully justified the Budget estimates, and therefore I am inclined to accept the motion made by the Senator from Colorado to restore all of those amounts—they are not large anyway—to the amounts of the estimates, and the clerk of the committee will furnish the desk with the figures.

Mr. PHIPPS. Yes; the clerk will furnish the estimates. The desire I had was that the figures of the Budget estimate should be reinstated in the bill in lieu of the figures adopted by the House.

Mr. WARREN. If there is no objection, they can go in and go to conference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, this is a small amount, but some of these days we shall have to raise the question here as to whether we are going by what Congress thinks ought to be done or by what the Budget recommends. The committees of Congress have passed on this matter of clerk hire and have agreed to certain sums. The Budget has recommended other sums. Now the Senator comes in here, without giving any reasons, and asks that the figures be raised to the recommendations of the Budget. Therefore the Budget is to control, and not Congress.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I tried to give one reason, and that was that the House had a misunderstanding of the comparative statement of the activities of these various surveyors' offices, and if they had known the real conditions I believe they would have been inclined to follow and accept the cuts that were made in these various offices, estimated for by the Land Office here, and approved by the Budget committee.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator from North Carolina that, as he remembers, it was a matter of some uncertainty in the committee, and the Senator from Colorado has looked up the mineral part of it, and I can easily see that there is a misunderstanding; but the Senator from North Carolina will be on the conference committee, and he can look into the matter further there.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want it understood that I am not making any special objection to this action; but when it is said that after the House and the Senate have recommended an appropriation we should go back to the Budget figures, that is no reason at all. That is the only point I wanted to make.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment passed over is on page 106, line 5, relative to the Grand Canyon.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, I ask that that amendment go over until to-morrow. My colleague, the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHurst], is down town and unable to get here to-night. I have just talked to him on the telephone and he makes that request, as he wants to talk on this subject, which I also wish to present to the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, why can not the Senator bring his colleague here to-night? The trouble is that there is an agreement now that we shall take a recess until a certain hour to-morrow, when another subject will be taken up, so that I do not know where we should land if we did not finish the bill to-night.

Mr. CAMERON. I should like very much to accommodate the Senator from Wyoming, but—

Mr. LODGE. This is not a question of carrying the bill over until to-morrow; it may be carried over for several days.

Mr. CAMERON. I understand that; but this is a very important question to me and to our constituents.

Mr. LODGE. Can it not be disposed of now?

Mr. CAMERON. The senior Senator from Arizona would like to speak on it, and he is unable to get here to-night. I have just talked to him on the telephone. It is not a matter that I want to put over, because I am willing to make my statement now.

Mr. WARREN. We are entirely ready to hear any statement the Senator wishes to make; but I shall be glad if he will send word to his colleague, who is usually very accommodating. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. HARRELD] has an amendment to offer, and it is not very late. It is only half past five. Will not the Senator try to get his colleague here? Of course we will remain in session until he can make any remarks he wants to make.

Mr. CAMERON. Very well. I will see what I can do.

Mr. WARREN. I wish the Senator would try that, please, so that we may get this bill to conference.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, the statement that I wish to make to the Senate pertains to the Grand Canyon National Park. It is located in Coconino County, Ariz., a county that I had established a great many years ago. About 78 per cent of the land in that county has been withdrawn by public withdrawals by the United States Government.

We first had on the public domain that is embraced in the Grand Canyon National Park a forest reserve. The forest reserve was managed and maintained under the forest regulations and everyone was getting along very well. During the Roosevelt administration it was made a national monument, and about two years ago it was made a national park.

I explored the Grand Canyon in 1883 and opened up the paths, the trails, the wagon roads, and blazed the roads around the rim of the Grand Canyon, and also promoted a railroad to the south rim of the Grand Canyon which is now in operation, connecting with the main line of the Santa Fe Railroad at Williams.

We have in Coconino County, connecting the Grand Canyon National Park, two county roads. They have been used for years. They have been maintained by the county. They are in excellent shape and have been kept in good condition. We have first-class railroad accommodations, by which you can get on a Pullman car at Chicago and go directly through to the Grand Canyon. Since the creation of the Grand Canyon National Park some $150,000 has been expended there by the management of the park, and I want to say to you here to-day, Mr. President, that you can not find where they have done anything worth while; yet you can see where there has been much from this expenditure of $150,000 foolishly wasted.

I contend that these appropriations are unnecessary, for the reason that we have every facility in the world to-day to visit the Grand Canyon National Park. We have a railroad that is not excelled by any other railroad in the United States—the Santa Fe system. We have fine highways across the State of Arizona. We have two beautiful rim roads that have been constructed by the county and the Forest Service up to the Grand Canyon. Now they propose to go on the north side of the rim, where it is nearly 200 miles from any railroad, and open up another camp, where they can bring tourists from the Union Pacific or the railroads to the north of there by stage line down to the rim of the Grand Canyon on the north side, where most of this money is to be expended.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CAMERON. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Does the Senator know whether or not his colleague is in favor of striking out this item?

Mr. CAMERON. He is. I saw him this afternoon, after I had talked with the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not see any reason, then, why we should not strike it out.

Mr. WARREN. The chairman of the committee is ready to have it stricken out, but I understood that there was some necessity of the Senator's colleague being here. I am perfectly ready to allow the amendment to be made.

Mr. CAMERON. I simply wanted to make this statement.

Mr. WARREN. I wish the Senator would finish his statement, because the matter will go to conference, and if the House insists upon its action, we shall have to defend ours, and we shall have to depend upon what the Senator says for the defense.

Mr. CAMERON. Understand, Senators, I do not care to talk on the subject, except that I want to make a statement that I know I am absolutely right in making as one who helped develop this entire country and who certainly understands the conditions; and there is no more excuse for our appropriating the public's money for this purpose than there is for my jumping off the Capitol to-night. I believe that if we are going to conserve the people's interests and take care of the people's money as we should, we should not make a foolish appropriation merely to satisfy somebody's whims or pet ideas who think they can do wonderful things by building certain pleasure camps out on the public domain, remote from any railroad, where no one can come in contact with them; where they can go out perhaps in a year's time and bring in 10 or 15 or 20 men with money to look over the greatest scenic wonder of the world. I contend that we can see the greatest scenic wonder of the world to-day from the south rim of the Grand Canyon. You can go there at your ease; you can go there in any way you want to, by vehicle, horseback, automobile, Pullman car, special train, or otherwise; and why should we in the United States Senate to-day appropriate this money when it is not needed?

I am sure that if the people of this country knew as much as I do about the Grand Canyon and knew that we do not need this appropriation, you would not, as a body of Senators, appropriate this money. One corporation alone controls every national park in the United States. Naturally they want camps built by Government money at remote places so that they can put on stage lines and drive automobiles from points two and three hundred miles away, when the Government expends money to build camps and roads for them. That is the idea. That is what is behind this.

Senators, the sooner we wake up to this condition the quicker we will get down to earth where we belong. We have spent too much money already for "isms" and fads and chasing rainbows; and so far as I am concerned, if I can stop it, I am going to do it, and I want to begin right now.

The idea of our squandering the people's money just to please a fad of Mr. Mather or any other man who chooses to be the representative of the Grand Canyon National Park or any other park is ridiculous. I say to you, without egotism, I hope, that I have been over nearly every park in this country. I have gone on horseback and on foot, and I know the Southwest, I believe, as well as any other living man on earth, and it is about time we brought a halt to this idea of having somebody come in here and appropriate our public domain for such "isms" and fads. It is wrong, Senators, and I am going to help stop it if I can. Will you help me?

It not only applies to this but it applies to other things as well. I could sit around here and never say a word, which at first thought would seem sensible, as this is a big appropriation going to my State, and not often do Senators oppose appropriations going their way, and perhaps what I am saying to-day will not meet with your approval; but I am expressing my honest convictions, and I serve notice that I shall go into this subject very thoroughly before this body with substantiating facts and figures within the very near future and show the people of this country the real workings of this National Park Service.

Mr. LODGE. May I ask the Senator from Arizona if his colleague agrees with him as to this matter?

Mr. CAMERON. He does.

Mr. LODGE. Then, why should it not be stricken out, may I ask the chairman of the committee?

Mr. WARREN. I have agreed that it may be stricken out.

Mr. LODGE. Then, let us strike it out.

Mr. WARREN. I may have to consult with the Senator from Arizona with regard to some language in connection with it. The Senator asked that he be allowed to state his reasons in order that we might have some of those reasons before us when we go to conference. I think his reasons are sufficient.

Let me ask the Senator first as to the item of $48,000.

Mr. CAMERON. It all ought to come out so far as that is concerned.

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator wish to cut the entire Grand Canyon National Park item out?

Mr. CAMERON. I think it all should come out.

Mr. WARREN. Let it all go out and go to conference and we will give it more consideration there.

Mr. CAMERON. Let it all be taken out.

Mr. WARREN. I think the provision on the next page should also go out with the other provision.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the proposed amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 105 strike out lines 18 to 25, both inclusive, and on page 106 strike out lines 1 to 7, both inclusive, as follows:

Grand Canyon National Park, Arizona: For administration, protection, and maintenance, including not exceeding $2,000 for the purchase, maintenance, operation, and repair of motor-driven passenger-carrying vehicles for the use of the superintendent and employees in connection with general park work, $48,000; for completion of Hermit Rim Road, for partial construction of new trail from South Rim to new suspension bridge, for reconstruction Kaibab trail, and including not to exceed $3,000 for ranger station and community centers for campers at headquarters, $40,000; for labor and material necessary for insect-control work on the north rim of the Grand Canyon, to be immediately available, $2,500; in all, $90,500: Provided, That no expenditure shall be made in the maintenance or improvement of any toll road or toll trail.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment on behalf of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], if the amendment is in order at this time. I ask that the Secretary state the amendment.

Mr. WARREN. Has the Senator consulted with the Senator from California about it recently?

Mr. McNARY. A few moments ago the Secretary of the Senator from California came and left the amendment with me, stating that the Senator was home and had telephoned him that he did not expect the bill would come up for consideration to-day, but if it did come up I might offer it in his behalf.

Mr. WARREN. I would like to read the Senator the testimony on that item. I saw the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] about 1 o'clock to-day and told him the situation. It seems that they took the appropriation from the one school which was burned and transferred it to the other, and they are to take pupils to other points. The provision seemed to be satisfactory to him. His anxiety was that none of the Indian children should be without education. We interrogated the commissioner very carefully about that, and the testimony in the House hearings shows the change they intended to make. If the Senator should ask to have it provide as they undertook to have it in the first instance, it would leave one set of children without schooling while the other school would have its usual complement. A hundred pupils is the outside number at the Bidwell and 100 at the Greenville school, and about 90 pupils each is the regular attendance. They took from $20,000 to $30,000 for the education and $28,000 for buildings and care.

They undertook to transfer the appropriation from the Greenville School to the Bidwell School on account of the fire, for this one year, so that they can furnish the transportation of part of those pupils to the other places. Some of them are provided for in public schools, and in the public schools they have to pay a proportion to the county where they attend. The authorities in some counties will not permit the Indian children to go with the white children, but in some of the others they do.

Mr. McNARY. I am wholly uninformed as to the situation. I am only doing this at the request of the Senator's secretary, and I assumed that the Senator wanted to have the amendment affixed to the bill. I would like to have it reported by the Secretary anyway, so that it will appear in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 41, after line 20, add the following:

For support and education of 100 Indian children at the Greenville Indian School, California, including pay of superintendent, $24,000; for general repairs and improvements, $4,000; for reconstruction of school building destroyed by fire on December 17, 1921, $60,000; in all, $88,000.

Mr. McNARY. From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 4 of the present year, at page 251, I am supplied with a statement by Mr. RAKER, of which perhaps the chairman is cognizant. If not, I would like to read it.

Mr. WARREN. We have a statement in regard to it in the committee hearings.

A fire occurred, I believe, after testimony was taken in the House committee. I have no wish to object to the Senator's amendment, if the Senator is assured that he is right.

Mr. McNARY. If the chairman will accept the amendment offered by me on behalf of the Senator from California, the matter can be gone into thoroughly in conference.

Mr. WARREN. I am willing to accept the amendment of the Senator and let it go to conference. I understand it does not affect any committee amendment at all.

Mr. McNARY. That can be worked out.

Mr. WARREN. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon in behalf of the Senator from California.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. President, I had prepared an amendment which I expected to offer and ask to have lie on the table. It is to be inserted on page 66. I will ask the Secretary to read the proposed amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 66, after line 11, insert the following:

Hereafter nontaxable Indian lands in the State of Oklahoma shall not be leased or rented unless, in addition to the restrictions now imposed, if any, the immunity from taxation is waived, under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, in so far as such immunity prevents the taxation by the State of Oklahoma, or by any political subdivision thereof, of the income of the lessee: Provided, That any tax upon any such income shall not be discriminatory and that any such lands shall not be held subject to a lien for the payment of any such tax: And provided further, That nothing in this paragraph shall be construed to permit the taxation by the State of Oklahoma of the lands or of royalties or rents received therefrom by any Indian owners, except as now provided by law.

Mr. WARREN. Let me say to the Senator that that is a subject which I do not feel we have had before us, or with which I am competent to deal, and unless there is a point of order made, I will raise no objection. It may go in and go to conference, but the Senator will, I hope, give me such information as he may have.

Mr. HARRELD. I would like to make a short statement, so that it may go to conference also.

The State of Oklahoma levies a tax known as a gross-production tax of 3 per cent on all oil produced in the State. In lieu of all other forms of taxation that 3 per cent tax is levied by the State, and paid.

They have been collecting that tax from the lessees of restricted Indian lands until recently, when the Supreme Court of the United States held, in the Gillespie case, that that could not be done under the terms of the leases as they have been heretofore executed. The court held that the lessee of restricted Indian land was the agent of the Indian, and therefore that he could not be taxed.

The result of that is this in a nutshell: If I have a lease on a tract of land, we will say of 100 acres, from some man who is not restricted, and somebody has a 100-acre tract immediately adjoining it, which is restricted land, I have to pay the gross production tax of 3 per cent on my production, but the man who has the Indian lease adjoining me does not have to pay the 3 per cent tax. It seems to me that that is manifestly unfair. This amendment does not propose to make any levy upon the restricted Indian at all; it is upon the production of a man who has a lease upon the restricted land.

When the Gillespie case was decided the governor of the State took up the matter with me, and I called a meeting of the congressional delegation from my State, which my colleague [Mr. OWEN] attended, and we agreed that we would attempt to get this amendment on the Indian appropriation bill, so that the State may be able to collect this 3 per cent gross-production tax from the man who takes oil off the restricted land on leases that are made hereafter. I repeat, it does not affect the interests of the restricted Indian at all; it affects only the production which a man gets from a restricted Indian lease.

It is a matter of immediate importance to the State. If we had to wait to procure legislation on this subject it would defeat the purposes for which we are striving, because many people who are now producing oil on these restricted lands would escape taxation during all of that time and during all of this year.

I ask that this provision be incorporated in the pending measure, because it is a matter which needs immediate attention and it should be remedied at once, so that the taxation of the State may be just and equitable.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. HARRELD].

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

AMENDMENT OF RAILROAD VALUATION ACT.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate and proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 539) to further amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have made diligent inquiry and I have not been able to find that anyone desires to speak upon the bill, nor do I believe that there is any opposition to it in the Senate. If I am correct in this respect, it will require but a moment to dispose of the bill, and the treaty with Japan, with reference to the island of Yap, will then be in full possession of the field.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no amendment as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RECESS.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate (at 6 o'clock p. m.) took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, February 24, 1922, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 23, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O God, whose bounty and mercy fill the earth, we thank Thee for Thy love that will not let us go. Be Thou unto us the hidden source of all our strength and hope, and with humble hearts may we accept what Thou dost ordain. Bestow upon us the peace of conscience, the joy of duty, and the spirit of consecration to the truth. Invigorate us with wisdom and clear vision to serve our country that gives us the great blessings of our free citizenship. And at all times may we have the heart of Him who was most pitiful, merciful, and loving toward all lives. In the name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MARINE INSURANCE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business is the bill which was under consideration yesterday, and which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 2265) to regulate marine insurance in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The previous question was ordered. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 47, noes 14.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote and make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point that there is no quorum present, and it is evident that no quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 247, noes 67, answered "present" 3, not voting 113, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

On motion of Mr. FOCHT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR DEPARTMENTS OF COMMERCE AND LABOR.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10559) making appropriations for the Departments of Commerce and Labor for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, and pending that motion I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] if we can agree upon time for general debate.

Mr. OLIVER. I think four hours would be sufficient, two hours to be controlled by the gentleman from Pennsylvania and two hours by myself.

Mr. SHREVE. Could we not get along with three hours?

Mr. OLIVER. I think it would take two hours to meet the requests I have.

Mr. SHREVE. Very well. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the debate be limited to four hours, one half of the time to be controlled by the ranking minority member and the other half by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the general debate shall be limited to four hours, two hours to be controlled by himself and two hours to be controlled by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the Departments of Commerce and Labor.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] will please take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10559) making appropriations for the Departments of Commerce and Labor for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, with Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10559, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10559) making appropriations for the Departments of Commerce and Labor for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, before taking up the consideration of this bill I desire to express my deep appreciation of the very loyal support received at the hands of the members of the subcommittee. I also wish to take this occasion to acknowledge the very valuable assistance of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON], who is not a member of the subcommittee, but on account of illness in the family of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. OGDEN], the gentleman from Iowa has taken his place. We greatly appreciate the work he has done.

Now, gentlemen, in bringing to your attention the appropriation bill covering the appropriations for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, I want to call your attention particularly to three things: First, we have not considered any matters that have not been recommended by the Bureau of the Budget; second, we have not increased any statutory positions or increased any salaries in the bill; and lastly it has been our purpose not to attach any new legislation to this bill.

In this connection I wish to say to the legislative committees of the House that there is very much legislation needed in the departments which are covered by this appropriation bill. I trust the legislative committees will use the hearings as the basis of their information. I will say that we went very exhaustively into all the subjects embraced by the original and supplemental estimates, not only for the purpose of satisfying the subcommittee as to the merits of appropriations but that the legislative committees might have information upon which to base their legislation.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHREVE. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. I think the gentleman has rendered a valuable service in that particular. Would it not be a good idea to put in your report suggested legislation that has come to the attention of the subcommittee, so that it might be in concrete form and thereby be made more available to the legislative committees, rather than to have them dig through the entire hearings in order to get at the legislation needed?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes. I am very glad the gentleman from Texas has raised that point, because it is a very valuable suggestion. I realize that to go through nearly a thousand pages of testimony requires some considerable effort. We can do that for the benefit of the legislative committees, and we shall be glad to do so.

Now, in taking up the consideration of the bill, I want to say to you that it has been our purpose to follow the current law as nearly as possible. There are very few increases. These are increases that we deem to be absolutely necessary, and they pertain to the management of the Department of Commerce, the foreign and domestic service, and the Bureau of Standards principally. We regard the Department of Commerce as the very heart of the Nation's business. The business men of the United States are beginning to take that same view of the proposition. I am sure that any gentleman who will carefully read the hearings concerning the work that has been done in every quarter of the world toward promoting and extending our foreign trade will concur in my statement.

For the Department of Commerce this bill proposes appropriations totaling $18,503,164, which is $916,104 more than was appropriated for the current fiscal year ending in June and $3,080,891.75 less than proposed in the original and supplemental estimates. For the Department of Labor this bill proposes appropriations totaling $6,826,920, which is $1,372,084.25 more than was appropriated for the current fiscal year and $1,227,712 less than proposed in the original and supplemental estimates. For the two departments combined the bill proposes $25,333,084, or $2,288,188.25 more than the appropriations made for these two departments for this fiscal year and $4,308,603.75 less than proposed in the original and supplemental estimates. I shall endeavor now to explain to you the reasons which prompted the committee to recommend the several increases making up the total sums to which I have referred.

We have allowed an increase of $100,000 in the appropriation for printing and binding in the Secretary's office. That increase of $100,000 in the appropriation for printing and binding grows out of the fact of the Census Bureau reverting to its permanent organization status on the 1st of July, 1922, necessitating annual appropriations during the ensuing fiscal year.

Now, the next increase is an item of $29,000 for commercial attachés. The department is asking for two offices, one in Cuba and one at Stockholm. The reason for asking for the office in Cuba is the fact that it is primarily the experimental station for the manufacturers of the United States who desire to go into the export business. They usually try it out on Cuba first, and our manufacturers are getting a great deal of very valuable information. Our exports to Cuba in 1913 were about $70,000,000. They have grown until now they are about $370,000,000. The American people have millions of dollars' worth of goods down there, and we have a great many Americans engaged in business there, so that for these reasons we felt that it was very proper to give the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce an office in Cuba.

As to Stockholm, I want to say that the trade with Stockholm in 1913 amounted to $45,000,000; that is, our exports for that year were $45,000,000. That has increased until at the present time it amounts to over $300,000,000. A commercial attaché stationed at Stockholm would not only handle the various trade opportunities in that vicinity but would cover Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, and just at the present time we are very greatly interested, particularly in the situation in Denmark. A little while ago I was crossing the continent and met a gentleman from one of the Western States who was going down to New York to sell a lot of butter.

He told me that up to that time they had not been able to sell butter in New York by reason of the fact that the people of Denmark could place butter in New York for less money than the people out in Iowa had been able to do. He said, however, that the emergency tariff bill had cured all that, so he was looking for the trade. I mention that as one of the items.

Another thing about the office at Stockholm is this, it will be the listening post for trade in northern Russia. The day is coming when the soviet government will have exhausted itself, when we are going to do business again in Russia. So we are also providing for some trade commissioners; not that we expect those trade commissioners to go into Russia at the present time, but we are placing them at the outposts so that they may be ready, so that that great trade that we once had may be properly directed into channels that will bring it back to the United States of America.

The next item is a matter of $54,000 for the promotion of foreign and domestic commerce. This is possibly one of the most important items in the bill. It covers principally the commercial attaché proposition to which I have just referred.

I might add in connection with what I have said regarding Stockholm and Cuba that it is our purpose to supply some additional clerks. We desire to supply some additional clerks in London and Paris, and for the purpose of the promotion and development of foreign and domestic commerce we are appropriating this additional $54,100. This is also for the establishment of trade commissioners in Russia, Athens, and Canada. Some one may ask the question why it is necessary to have a trade commissioner in Athens.

The secretary of the Chamber of Commerce of Athens appeared before the committee the other day and told us of the wonderful prospect for trade with Greece, in which Athens is a sort of commercial crossroads, a meeting place, a place from which trade will spread all over that country; and while financial conditions at the present time are not all that they should be, yet Athens is another one of those posts where we should be established. The trade there has increased in the last three years from about $7,000,000 to $26,000,000. Another thing, the Greeks are very anxious to do business with the United States, because so many of them have been over here, and they have been trained to the use of American commodities. They like our ways. They go back to their own country, and immediately they desire to supply themselves with the luxuries that they have enjoyed in the United States. Soon they are engaged in the mercantile business. So it all means that the trade is going in that direction.

I might say that after the war there was a great congestion in the eastern Mediterranean ports. Goods that were primarily intended for the Baltic ports were stopped down there. The people in Athens and that vicinity got the benefit of those goods, but now they are nearly all exhausted, and the people there are about ready to begin trade negotiations again.

The next item of increase is for the promotion of commerce in Central and South America. We feel that trade possibilities in Central and South America are probably the most important at the present time of any in the whole world. For that reason we are asking first for some new offices in Colombia, Uruguay, and Venezuela. Look at the situation down in Colombia. As you all know, we have recently adjusted our affairs with the Colombian Government and have agreed to pay them $25,000,000 in installments. The people of Colombia are very friendly to us at the present time. They want to do business with us. They are ready to do business with us.

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHREVE. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. DUNBAR. How much of that $25,000,000 has been paid to Colombia?

Mr. SHREVE. I understand that the payments are to be made $5,000,000 at a time, and that an estimate has been submitted covering the first payment.

Mr. LAYTON. Was there any specific appropriation for the payment of that $25,000,000?

Mr. SHREVE. I understand not.

Mr. DICKINSON. If the gentleman will allow me, there is an item of $5,000,000 for the first payment under the Colombian treaty now pending before the subcommittee on deficiencies, so that is under consideration.

Mr. LAYTON. None of it has been paid yet?

Mr. SHREVE. No. Now, what are the trade possibilities in Colombia? In the first place, there are only two countries in the world where platinum is produced. One is Russia and the other is Colombia. Then we get coffee from Colombia.

Another thing, experts tell us that the oil development in Colombia will exceed even the development in Mexico. It is a country of only about 5,000,000 people, with 500 miles of railroad, with no line from the coast back to the capital. There is a wonderful opportunity there for our railroad supplies, our machinery, and various other commodities, and we felt justified in proposing that a trade commissioner be placed in Colombia.

We placed another trade commissioner in Uruguay. You will remember that Uruguay is down just south of Brazil, and it is the port of entrance to the southern part of Brazil. It is a wonderfully fine country, a country very much like Kansas, Iowa, and that country out in the Middle West. The people are principally farmers, and we take from them large quantities of meat, hides, wool, and so forth.

In this connection I wish to say that the old trade channels are broken up. The wool that formerly went to London is now sent to Boston, the greatest woolen market in the world. Coffee that formerly went from Brazil to London now finds its way to New York. Tin that is produced in Bolivia is now being sent to Perth Amboy. And, gentlemen, the South American people are trading in the United States against the accounts established by reason of their products coming into our country instead of going to foreign lands.

Now to get back to Uruguay. The people of Uruguay are very friendly to the United States, and it is a curious fact that their money is worth 10 cents on the peso more than the American dollar. Montevideo, the principal city, is a city of culture, where there are splendid schools and universities—one of the finest cities in South America. It is said that they speak the finest and purest Spanish in Uruguay of any people in South America. It is a very attractive spot, large numbers of Americans go there, and we feel that they, too, are entitled to a trade commissioner.

We are also increasing the clerical assistance of the trade commissioner in Buenos Aires. The great country of Argentina, extending from the Andes to the Atlantic Ocean, and with a coast line as long as from Maine to Florida, is one of the finest countries in the world. Its principal city is Buenos Aires, one of the finest cities on the American Continent, either North or South. They are a wonderful people. The trade possibilities there are good, and we felt justified in giving the trade commissioner some assistance.

This South American situation is in very many ways unique. We have been doing business in South America for a good many years with more or less success, and sometimes with less. There seems to have been a general propaganda going on against us in that country since away back in the days when they found fault with our Monroe doctrine. That is not an issue now. But they have an issue now almost as bad as the Monroe doctrine. They say that the United States of America is absorbing all the gold in the world, and we are doing that for the purpose of bearing down and depressing the exchange of the whole world, so they feel that a commercial war will be worse than any other kind of warfare.

There is another bit of propaganda going on in South America against us. We have established branch banks in the principal cities all over South America, and they are rendering valuable services to our exporters, because our paper, drafts, acceptances, and so forth, find their way through the American banks, formerly going through London, which in a way gave publicity to the transactions. Now the financial transactions are handled almost exclusively by Americans, and so in that regard we are in fine shape. But unfortunately a little while ago one of our banks made a bad loan, and immediately it was taken up by the propagandists, who said that the United States of America was financing wildcat propositions.

Mr. KING. Would the gentleman object to divulging the name of that bank?

Mr. SHREVE. I will say in answer to the gentleman that I have not the name of the bank, but I am making my statement from the record, in which the gentleman can find verification. However, our commercial attachés are in a position to counteract this propaganda. It becomes necessary for us to have men on the ground thoroughly familiar with all of these propositions able to give the intelligent South American people the facts and tell what the condition is.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHREVE. I will.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Has the gentleman any figures as to the proportion of the trade that the United States has with the leading South American countries?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes; we are doing on an average three times as much business with the South American countries as we did before the war. Now, speaking of trade with South America, there are a lot of people who think that we have absorbed the trade of foreign countries. That is not correct. If you make a careful analysis of the situation in South America you will find that 85 per cent of our trade is merchandise that they can not buy in foreign countries. A large proportion of it is medium and cheap automobiles. Then there is manufacturing machinery which can not be bought abroad. Also clothing manufactures, and a multitude of things that they are unable to buy abroad, and so they buy of us and will continue to buy from us if we are alert and keep wide-awake men on the job.

It is necessary to do the proper thing and meet this propaganda. The propaganda was not started by the people of South America, but by our friends who are in competition with us and who want to get the business away from us.

Mr. FOCHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHREVE. I will.

Mr. FOCHT. To what extent is this merchandise which we sell to South American countries carried in American vessels, and will the gentleman later discuss the question of subsidy?

Mr. SHREVE. No; I will not discuss the question of subsidy, but I will say that the trade with South America is carried very largely in American bottoms; but however strange it may appear, if a shipper in New York or Hamburg wants to send some goods to South America and there is a tramp steamer going down, and he can send his flour or other goods for 25 cents a barrel less than he can in American bottoms, I regret to say that the American shipper is likely to use the foreign bottom. I asked to what extent the German people were crippled by the loss of their merchant marine, and the answer came back "very little," because they employed tramp steamers to carry their merchandise to all parts of the world, and perhaps get it carried for less money than they did when they carried it themselves.

Before leaving the South American matter I want to say that I think the people of North America and of South America should stand together. We should make the two Americas the last ideal in the civilization of the world. [Applause.] It is the United States of America that blazed the way, made the trail, but in the last analysis it is not one nation but many nations, not one flag but many flags. In 1775 we caught a vision of the new Nation conceived in liberty and dedicated to the principle that all men are created equal. Now let us establish a broad policy with our South American neighbors, so that it will become the firm and fixed foundation upon which the destinies of the whole world shall rest. [Applause.] I think we should catch a new vision of the organized American Republics, north and south. They are all vitally related, they all have the same ideals, and let them be united in the bonds of peace and good will. [Applause.] Gentlemen, to my mind this should be America's highest purpose, inspiring, unifying, and fundamental. [Applause.]

The next item of increase is for the promotion of commerce in the Far East. We propose to try and add another trade commissioner in China, and we want to place one at Bombay or Calcutta and another one in Delhi. I will mention the Chinese situation first. You remember that during the last year the United States of America has been able to sell to the Chinese people over $2,000,000 worth of cotton machinery. Those contracts were secured largely through our commercial attaché at Peking, with the assistance of his trade commissioners. We have only four or five men to look after the whole of China, so that we thought we should send a man down to Canton, perhaps, as a trade commissioner, because the Chinese people want to do business with us. For more than 20 years the Chinese people have been looking to the United States of America for inspiration, for guidance, and for direction. Many of you will remember back to the time of the Boxer rebellion. A settlement was made, and it was decided that the United States of America should have $25,000,000 of the indemnity fund to be paid. When we figured up our actual expenses we found that they were only about $13,000,000, and we remitted the balance to China.

The Chinese Government could not understand. They sent representatives over here to find out about it. When they found that we did not intend to take the money they created a commission over in China, whose business it is to use that money in the education of young Chinamen, and for 20 years from 50 to 100 young Chinamen have been coming to this country each year. They have gone back and are now engaged in business. They are the principal citizens in China. We had one of them with us just a little while ago in the Armament Conference, Mr. Wellington Koo, who is a graduate of Columbia University. He was afterwards sent to Mexico as minister there before taking his place as minister to the United States. Then he went over to Britain and was sent back here as one of the commissioners to settle these great international problems between the various nations of the earth. This Chinese trade is just waiting over there for us. All we have to do is to go and get it, to use some intelligence in the way of promoting our trade in China and in the Far East generally.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I agree most heartily with the splendid recital the gentleman has given as to our foreign trade. I notice that the recommendation of the Budget for the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce was some $740,000 increase. The committee has given $300,000. Does the gentleman think that is enough to take care of our increased foreign trade?

Mr. SHREVE. It will go a long way. We felt at this time that we must reduce expenses, notwithstanding the fact that the committee is satisfied with the great possibilities of foreign trade that is coming to us, just a little way off. However, it is not here yet, and we thought that possibly under all of the circumstances for the present we should not give more than the sum which the gentleman has just mentioned.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. For this great purpose, which concerns the prosperity of the whole people of the United States, regardless of employment, why did not the gentleman's committee divert a million dollars from the maternity proposition and put it over here on this?

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad to answer the gentleman. I have wanted to make a little statement here, to the effect that the Committee on Appropriations is not a legislative committee. The committee does not propose to attempt any legislation on appropriation bills. We want that thoroughly established. Congress has authorized $1,240,000 and we have appropriated that for that particular item referred to by the gentleman. It is the duty of the Appropriations Committee to appropriate sums of money, if they are justified, when authorized by the Congress, and we have no right whatever to transfer that million and a quarter dollars over to some other fund.

Mr. LAYTON. My idea about the question which I asked the gentleman was that I had hoped between the time of the passage of that bill and the present time some sanity has been restored to this body.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that there will be nothing to prevent the gentleman from Delaware testing that proposition when that item is reached in the bill.

Mr. LAYTON. Which I propose to do.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I now call attention to the item of $135,000 for the combined investigation of foreign and domestic problems with respect to production, distribution, marketing, and so forth. That item covers a great variety of things relating to the important exporting industries of the United States.

The Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce has established a number of commodity divisions. They are finding that these divisions are meeting with an instant response at the hands of the manufacturers of the United States. We have added sufficient funds to provide for 9 or 10 more of these commodity divisions. They have had in operation for the last year or so a commodity division covering vehicles, automobiles, foodstuffs, textiles, films, leather, and so forth—I shall not attempt to go through the whole list. I call attention to just one of the items and that is with respect to automobiles. The department met with an instant response from every automobile manufacturer in the United States in connection with the establishment of a commodity division dealing with automobiles. The first thing to do was to select the proper men to represent this activity in the Department of Commerce. The director put the proposition up to the automobile men themselves. Finally the nominees narrowed down to about 68 or 70, and by continued process of elimination the number finally was reduced to two of the most expert automobile men in the United States—men who have traveled abroad, men who speak the language of the country where they will be sent. One of these men is in the office here at present and the other is now on his way to the Far East. The work done last year was found to be of the greatest service to the manufacturers of automobiles. For instance, it was found that in Shanghai there was an ordinance that automobiles with a certain kind of a horn should not be allowed to land. They are not only finding the trade opportunities, but they are finding out the hindrances. It is things like these that we have to watch out for. Somebody asked me the other day just how a manufacturer could receive any benefit from this department. I asked him first what his proposition was. He said that he wanted to sell some hosiery down in Venezuela. Very well, I told him to write a letter down to the Department of Commerce making known his request. That report would go down to the trade commissioner in Venezuela, unless they had the information in the office, and in about 48 hours he could get an answer back, if it was of sufficient importance.

These men are watching these trade opportunities all over the world. It was one of our commercial attachés that worked up a $13,000,000 deal in Argentina. Our commercial attaché there, who has now the honor of presiding over this department, truly the right man in the right place, started a little deal down there with the Baldwin Locomotive Co. and another concern and secured orders for $13,000,000 worth of machinery. This very valuable order from South America came solely through and by reason of one of the efforts of one of our commercial attachés down in that country. So we propose to give them enough money to create several new departments, 8 or 10, all told, covering vegetable oils, foodstuffs, and numerous other things.

Now, for the Bureau of the Census we are proposing appropriations totaling $1,741,780. I want to say for this bureau that it is one department of the Government that seems to me entitled to very great credit for the way they are finishing up their work. The director of the bureau informs us that their work would be completed—that is, the work of taking the population would be completed—it is already in the hands of the printer—on time at the end of the fiscal year.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHREVE. I will.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. The manufacturers' census, I understand, is to be taken this year?

Mr. SHREVE. I am glad the gentleman mentioned the matter of the manufacturers' census. It is one problem that has given a good deal of trouble, because it will cost over $800,000 to finish that census, and when completed it is nothing but ancient history, a census of 1921. Of course, it will be finished. But I am in hopes that the appropriate legislative committees might go into the matter and see if they can not devise some way by which some of that money will be saved. I will say that it is a matter that the Secretary of Commerce is very deeply interested in. He came before our committee and made a reduction in the bureau's estimate of over $400,000, but there is a feeling that it is a large waste of money, and we hope that the Secretary of Commerce will be able to devise some means by which the census can be taken and made available more promptly. We found in our examination that the method is to send out a questionnaire to the manufacturers, which they fill out and send back. They are expected to give their answer in 30, 60, or 90 days, but there is much difficulty in getting correct reports. There are lots of manufacturing concerns who do not respond and who do not fill out the questionnaire, and final result has not come up to expectations.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. What I want to ask the gentleman about is that I see provision is made for payment not to exceed $8 a day for these special agents. I understood that these agents were paid on a piecework basis.

Mr. SHREVE. It is the old law, I will say to my colleague. We had to go back to the law of 1919, because the census-taking period covering the last three years is over.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. That is in conformity with the old law?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes. The next item is the Bureau of Navigation. That bureau has volunteered a reduction of $5,000. This comes about by reason of duplication, and we found that they could get along without making this appropriation of $5,000. In the Bureau of Standards we have proposed three or four increases. The first of them is for the purpose of having an investigation regarding the molasses situation. It seems that the molasses ordinarily is worth about $20 a ton and at the present time it is down to $2 a ton. The cane-sugar growers—and they are the ones who make the molasses—find they are unable to sell the molasses, and they are unable to give it away, and it is against the law to throw it away, so they are in a bad fix, and we are going to give the department $10,000 for the purpose of making some experiments, and we hope they will be able to find just what the people over on the other side are doing with their molasses situation, because they seem to have it solved. The Bureau of Standards is doing a very splendid work and we would be glad if there was more money for them, but they are in cooperation with all the manufacturing industries of the United States, and the industries are bearing in some instances a large part of the expense.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. SHREVE. I will.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. It is well known that molasses is one of the most common ingredients of stock food and very extensively manufactured in Tarkio, Mo., and many other places in this country. It may not be pertinent to the discussion of this question, but at the same time I have observed that the gentleman's statement is corroborated by statements in the public press that at the present freight rate the molasses product is absolutely prohibitive. There is great demand for this as stock food in the West and in my own State. I am told about a thousand tons of it are consumed annually, and there is a prospect within the limits of our own country of a better commercial use and demand for this product and that it could be utilized except for the freight rates that make it absolutely prohibitive to transport it.

Mr. SHREVE. I am very thankful to the gentleman for the definite information which he has given. I am inclined to think freight rates enter into the situation. It is a scientific problem that ought to be settled at this time and one that would seem to benefit the farmers. The next is the Bureau of Lighthouses. Now, strange as it may seem, we have increased the appropriation $603,000 on account of aids to navigation, but at the same time we have reduced the Lighthouse Service by $498,000. That comes about by reason of our failure to appropriate money for vessel construction.

You all remember the act of June 5, 1920, authorizing a $5,000,000 building program for the Bureau of Lighthouses. They have already had an appropriation of $1,000,000, and they are building five ships with that money. They asked for $737,000 more. But your committee felt that with conditions as they are at the present time these services should find somewhere in our merchant marine, in our Navy, or some place else where we have the ships in storage, some ships that they could use that would answer their purpose and make it unnecessary for them to purchase them. We were not altogether satisfied that they needed these ships at the present time. They have 40 light-vessel stations and they have 15 relief lightships. Some of them are old, of course, but the testimony shows that there are five new vessels now under construction. One will be used on a new station, where no vessel is now maintained, and the others will be used to replace old ships. So we thought they could get along.

The Coast and Geodetic Survey, which is a wonderfully fine bureau and doing a splendid work, has recently secured two ships from the Navy. They were mine sweepers. They are going to be used on the Pacific coast, and we are going to help them to rig up those ships, and we give them about $58,000 for the operation of the ships, and that will enable them to bring the Lydonia around to the Atlantic coast. And we are going to give them $27,000 for the operation of that ship. Their work this year will be in triangulation and finishing up the work that has already been started. They want to work with their drag outfits along the Pacific coast, where the wrecks have been so numerous.

I want to say that we have added a new item, one for the investigation of earthquakes. It is a very important matter to the people of California. The universities out there are studying the proposition, and they desire to get into a point of contact with the Government so that the Government may know what they are doing. It is a matter of very great importance to the people out there, and we concluded that it would be wise to give them an appropriation of $15,000 to assist in this work. Why, one of the scientists who came before us started his remarks by saying that the mountains were moving north at the rate of a foot and a half a year. That certainly attracted our attention. I hope you will read the hearings on the subject. At least your committee were satisfied they should give them the $15,000.

The Bureau of Naturalization—

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Before the gentleman leaves the Department of Commerce, may I ask him a question concerning a matter that has been brought to my attention several times, and that is the use of radio grounds utilized by the great transmitting stations? Under what bureau of the Department of Commerce is that matter handled?

Mr. SHREVE. I think that comes under the Bureau of Lighthouses. I will explain to the gentleman the situation there. That bureau has a very wonderful contrivance which they are using now out of New York and which is a sort of a range finder. They have, say, a little radio station over here and another little station over here, and they send out a notice or warning on something like a telegraph instrument, say, with one dot or two dots or a dot and a dash, and these messages are received on shipboard by some sort of a receiving device studied out by the Bureau of Standards, and so it enables the ships, when there is low visibility, to be able to direct their course.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I am speaking particularly of the land stations. We have one at the Westinghouse Electric.

Mr. SHREVE. They are under the Navy Department. The only thing we have considered is these very small stations.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I called up the Secretary of Commerce the other day and he informed me that there is to be a convention held on the 27th of February, when the operators of these stations will be called here for consideration of laws regulating the service, and I was wondering what department that came under.

Mr. SHREVE. I do not know; but I will say that there is great need of legislation along those lines. There is probably no service in the United States that has grown so rapidly as this has. A little while ago, when I was home, I listened to a grand opera in Pittsburgh, and everything went smoothly until about half past 9 when somebody "buted" in and said that they wanted to talk to Annapolis. Something must be done to regulate such a condition as that.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. The gentleman does not believe that that should come under the Navy Department?

Mr. SHREVE. I do not know. They are doing quite a large part of that work now.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. It seems to me that that is a part of the Department of Commerce's operation.

Mr. CHALMERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHREVE. Certainly.

Mr. CHALMERS. I want to make an observation along this line, to the effect that in the serving of lighthouses and life-saving stations it seems that there is a waste of money and efficiency. They come, to be sure, under different departments, but they are all under your Committee on Appropriations. I happen to know of a case down in the district represented by my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

There is a lighthouse there at North Truro, on Cape Cod. There is a life-saving station a mile distant, on the shore; and yet the Government of the United States sends two ships there to serve those two small stations—the lighthouse, under one department, and the life-saving station, a mile away, under another department. It seems to me that that is a matter that ought to be worked out in the cause of good efficiency by your committee or by some other committee.

Mr. SHREVE. I thank the gentleman for the very valuable information.

Mr. MANN. Is there a post office there, too?

Mr. CHALMERS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Why not have the post office get its supplies from the same vessel? [Laughter.]

Mr. SHREVE. The next item is the Department of Labor. We have not recommended any increases, except in the case of the Children's Bureau, where the increase is $1,240,000, by reason of the maternity law heretofore referred to. And we cite a portion of the law in the report.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHREVE. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. KING. Does the gentleman intend to refer to the appropriation for the Bureau of Fisheries before he finishes?

Mr. SHREVE. I thank the gentleman. I do not want to skip that. The Bureau of Fisheries is going along on an even tenor, and we have restored a few of their stations that were taken out.

The Director of the Budget made some recommendations to curtail the operations of the bureau, but after more mature consideration they recommended that they be put back in again.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. KING. Was there any discussion before the subcommittee, or is there any proposition pending before the committee, to appropriate any money for fish-rescue work in the Mississippi River? Millions of fish are there being destroyed.

Mr. SHREVE. I understand that has been taken care of for a considerable time. We have appropriated for the fish hatcheries that are handling the fish that are gathered from the pools and holes which are left by the subsidence of the water of the Mississippi.

Mr. KING. There is an appropriation in this bill for that, is there?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. The gentleman from Illinois says the fish are being destroyed in the Mississippi River. The question is, Why are they being destroyed? It looks to me, from what little attention I have paid to that matter and from reading the hearings before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, that the destruction of the fish in the Mississippi River is due chiefly to the pollution of the stream from numerous cities and towns along the course of the river and from the innumerable manufacturing plants.

Mr. KING. The gentleman from Delaware is in error as to that. It is not due to that cause or to the passage of the maternity bill. In high water the banks of the river overflow and great quantities of fish are left in various ponds and pools by the receding waters, where they simply die and go to waste. The Bureau of Fisheries have attempted to do some work along that line to save millions of fish of great food value.

Mr. LAYTON. But I see that the gentleman's maternity instincts are involved even in fish. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHREVE. That item remains the same as it was last year. As the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING] said, those losses of fish are due largely to floods. These little fish are left in the pools by the receding water, and later on the men in the Fisheries Service come along and take care of them, and in that way the loss is prevented.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. SHREVE. Gladly.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. It seems to me the suggestion made a little while ago by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] is a very valuable one; that is, that the Committee on Appropriations should embody in its various reports legislation that it thinks ought to be enacted, so that the recommendations of the Committee on Appropriations in that regard may thus be brought to the attention of the various standing committees. I made the same suggestion to the former chairman of the committee in the last Congress, and it received its approval. I find now from a communication that has reached us recently from the White House that the Budget Bureau is itself suggesting legislation that appears to be necessary in connection with the expenditure of funds that are appropriated. Of course, such suggestion from the bureau ought to be considered by the standing committees. But aside from that, if a steady policy were adopted of embodying in the reports accompanying these appropriation bills a statement of what general legislation should be enacted it would serve a very useful purpose. And I understand from the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that he proposes to put into effect that policy.

Mr. SHREVE. I fully agree with the gentleman from Virginia, and I will say that during the last year I was on the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and we carried out the idea suggested by the gentleman from Virginia. We heard the testimony and prepared another bill as we went along, and we introduced a bill on certain items and it became a law, and we did not have to interfere with the functions of the other committee, because the bill was reported to the other legislative committee, and with its approval it finally became a law. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. DOWELL). The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHREVE] has consumed 55 minutes.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the committee rise briefly for the purpose of receiving some reports.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the committee rise. Is there objection? There was no objection.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DOWELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 10559) making appropriations for the Departments of Commerce and Labor for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 7483. An act for the relief of Robert G. Whitfield;

H. R. 8924. An act to amend the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes," approved March 30, 1920; and

H. R. 9060. An act to authorize the Secretary of War to lease a certain tract of land to the city of Leavenworth, in the State of Kansas.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 160. An act for the relief of Kristina Furjak;

S. 1951. An act for the relief of John Hickson, Jr.;

S. 2736. An act providing for the conveyance of certain unused military reservations in the State of Massachusetts to the city of Salem and the town of Marblehead;

S. 982. An act for the relief of Louisa Frow; and

S. 621. An act to amend subdivisions (a) and (c) of section 206 of the transportation act, 1920.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE DEPARTMENTS OF COMMERCE AND LABOR.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10559, the appropriation bill for the Departments of Commerce and Labor.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10559, with Mr. DOWELL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10559, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10559) making appropriations for the Departments of Commerce and Labor for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] is recognized.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, it is an old controversy, but recently I have discovered that in the last edition of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the permanent one, the myth that Andrew Jackson was born on the McKemey plantation in North Carolina has been engrafted on our Congressional Directory, and I desire to controvert that proposition and once for all place before the Congress and this country the evidence as to the birthplace of Andrew Jackson.

The controversy about the birth of Andrew Jackson is one which should be settled on the evidence and not on personal preferences. I myself am a native of North Carolina; left there after I was 21 years of age; was born and reared in the Scotch-Irish settlements about 60 miles from where Jackson was born, and have no reason to question the claim of North Carolina to his birthplace except the truthfulness of history. My admiration for the State of my birth would forbid my undertaking improperly to take away any of her claims of distinction. But this controversy arose first in the mistake of the surveyors in locating the lines between the Provinces. They were directed in 1735 to start at the mouth of Little River south of Wilmington and run to the thirty-fifth parallel of latitude, and that parallel was then to be followed to complete the northern line. By error they stopped 11 miles short of the thirty-fifth parallel, and when they started to complete the line they found when they got to Waxhaw Creek that they were 11 miles south of their line. The line was to run around the Catawba Indian Nation, which had 144,000 acres of land, which would run the line at that point above the thirty-fifth parallel. That line had been run in 1763, and the eastern line at its southern point had reached Twelve Mile Creek 3 miles below the thirty-fifth parallel and stopped on Gum Corner, and the State line should have cut that line, therefore, 3 miles above Twelve Mile Creek. When it was found to be 8 miles below, they established a rock corner at Waxhaw Creek and the line between that rock corner and the Gum Corner on Twelve Mile Creek was not settled finally until 1815.

You see, here on the map is the line. They were to come up to this parallel, but for some unknown reason they stopped 11 miles south of the parallel. That stood until 1765, when they were directed to go there and finish it. In the meanwhile the Catawba Indian Reservation was run out here, as you see on this map, containing 144,000 acres of land, and it was understood that it was to be entirely in South Carolina. The line was run around that in 1763 and came to Twelve Mile Creek, which is shown here, at which they established a corner known as the Gum Corner, which is still extant.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEVENSON. I will yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. LITTLE. The gentleman says "it was understood." What does the gentleman mean by "understood"?

Mr. STEVENSON. It was agreed between the two Provinces of North and South Carolina, I am informed. Then when they went to make the northern line here, that was to be the thirty-fifth parallel clear through here, and they were to run it until they struck the Indian reservation and then run around it and to take the thirty-fifth parallel again and complete the line. That was the understanding between the Provinces. But when they got here they found they were 11 miles below the thirty-fifth parallel and 8 miles below the corner of the Indian reservation, and they lay down and quit and placed a stone corner by two oaks near Waxhaw Creek. (See map.) That was in 1765. Then in 1772 they took up this line and ran the northern line from the Catawba River west, and rather than surrender this piece of territory south of the thirty-fifth parallel, east of the Indian reservation, a piece north of the thirty-fifth parallel and west of the Catawba River was given in exchange for it. But the 8-mile line here from Waxhaw Creek, where they established a rock corner in 1765, to Gum Corner, on Twelve Mile Creek, was in dispute. The State of South Carolina claimed that it was a straight line and the State of North Carolina claimed that it followed the road, and all the maps, as I will show you by one of them presently, carried it by the public road, which threw the James Crawford grant of land largely into North Carolina. Meanwhile the Crawfords were granted a tract of land by South Carolina, and the same tract of land was granted by North Carolina to Gen. Andrew Pickens, that being the place on which Gen. Jackson was born. So that from 1765 until an agreement was reached in 1815 the Crawford land, on which Jackson was born, according to one claim was in North Carolina, and according to another was in South Carolina, and the map showed the Carolina road as the dividing line, and that threw the Crawford land largely into North Carolina, though the Crawford house was in South Carolina. Therefore, while the claim was set up that Jackson was born in North Carolina, it was well established and everybody admitted that he was born on the Crawford plantation. There was no dispute about that. The dispute was whether the Crawford place was in North or South Carolina.

Now, in 1813 the two States reached an agreement and sent a commission to settle that line, and extended the northern line, which had only been run about to Tryon, and ran it out to the Georgia line. That commission worked two years. They adopted the straight line from the stone at Waxhaw Creek to Gum at Twelve Mile Creek, which put the Crawford plantation in South Carolina and established the Crawford land as Crawford's and not as Pickens's. That was ratified at a great conference between the governor of North Carolina and the governor of South Carolina on November 2, 1815, at Greenville, S. C. Some of you may have heard of the remark of the governor of North Carolina to the governor of South Carolina.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. What was it?

Mr. STEVENSON. Of course, they were the governors of two neighboring sovereignties, and when the governor referred to himself he did not say "I," but he said "the governor of North Carolina says" so and so "to the governor of South Carolina." That was the way they conducted it, and there was a great deal of dignity about it.

Mr. STEPHENS. What was it he said?

Mr. STEVENSON. Finally, at a long sitting, when the refreshments ran low, the governor of North Carolina is said to have remarked, "The governor of North Carolina wishes to remark to his excellency the governor of South Carolina that it is a long time between drinks." [Laughter.] Now, that was when that was settled, and the agreement on that straight line settled it that Andrew Jackson was born in South Carolina, because nobody disputed that he was born on his Uncle James Crawford's plantation, that that was where his mother lived. That was one of the burning questions settled, and was in direct issue, because of Jackson's great prominence as a general just then. (See Foote's Sketch of North Carolina, below cited, pp. 198, 476.)

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. DUNBAR. Is it not contended that he was born at the home of Mr. McKemey?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes; and I will come to that in a moment.

Mr. DUNBAR. The gentleman just said he was born at the home of Mr. James Crawford.

Mr. STEVENSON. He was born on Crawford's plantation, in South Carolina, in a tenant house, separate from Crawford's, where he lived and grew up with his mother till he was 15; and I will give you the evidence in a minute, and I will show you how the myth came about the McKemey plantation. I defy you to find any claim anywhere, from Bancroft, the historian, down, or any statement made anywhere that did not attribute Jackson's birthplace to South Carolina until 1859, 14 years after his death.

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. I can not yield any more. I want to go through this now consecutively. Let us look at the evidence a minute. Mr. Parton, in his history, admits that Jackson said he was born in South Carolina and that he lived in South Carolina till 1784; but he said Jackson did not know whether he was born there or not. That is the basis of this new statement made, which was vamped up in 1859—"that Jackson said he was born in South Carolina, but he did not know."

I set out below nine documents, each signed by Jackson, in each of which he asserts that he was a native of Lancaster County, S. C.; 12 statements in all, signed by him, in 20 years. But Parton says he did not know. To be sure he only knew what he had been told, but he had canvassed the question, because he says, in answer to the direct question, in his letter of August 11, 1824, to Witherspoon:

I was born in South Carolina, as I have been told, on the plantation whereon James Crawford lived.

And so forth.

In other words, the question had been up and Jackson had canvassed the question; he had asked the witnesses, and necessarily he had access to the best witnesses in the world—his mother, his brothers, and his uncles—and their testimony to him is the testimony which he transmits to us. No question can be raised as to his belief in it, and he was not the man to believe fairy tales.

To complete the statements of Jackson, I will set out as Exhibit A the report of the Historical Commission of South Carolina to the general assembly in 1908, which gives the whole controversy. It contained a photostatic copy of the map made by Eugene Reilly, of Lancaster County, in 1820, on which is the same statement as is found in Mills's and Boykin's maps herein referred to and set out, "Gen. Jackson's birthplace," on the Crawford land in Lancaster County, S. C. This map is on file with the historical commission at Columbia, S. C. Mr. Parton also stated that one of his witnesses, James Falkner, a man dead 50 years, said that Jackson and he were once sleeping together at the McKemey house in North Carolina, and Jackson told him that he was born in that house. Parton says Jackson did not know, and thereby destroys the truthfulness of his main witness or the truthfulness of the man who claimed to have heard Falkner say so and related it to him.

But let us see what Jackson said about it, and while he did not know himself where he was born, still there is not a man here that knows where he was born; but there is no man living who lived with his mother 15 years whose mother has not told him where he was born, and that is evidence that is taken in all courts of law, because it is considered primary evidence. Now, I want to put before you a letter written by Jackson in 1824 to James H. Witherspoon.

In 1824 James H. Witherspoon, of Lancaster, S. C., asked him the exact question. He replied promptly and frankly as follows:

NASHVILLE, August 11, 1824.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of the 24th ultimo is just received, and although an entire stranger to you, feel a lively interest in your prosperity and that of your family, your lady being the descendant of a distant relation by marriage and one for whom I had a sincere regard, being raised together—I mean your lady's mother. I have had a great wish to revisit my native State and once more mingle with those friends of my juvenile days who may still be living, but I have been hitherto prevented by circumstances over which I had no control, and I am now prevented from accepting the opportunity that the friendly invitation of my fellow citizens through you would now afford for many reasons unnecessary now to enumerate; next spring may afford me an opportunity with my family of visiting the country that gave me birth, when it will afford me much pleasure and when I shall avail myself of the pleasure of seeing you and your family at your own house and offering up a prayer for that son of yours, that you have honored me with his name, that he may long live and be a blessing to his parents in their old age.

As to the question asked, I with pleasure answer. I was born in South Carolina, as I have been told, at the plantation whereon James Crawford lived, about 1 mile from the Carolina road crossing of the Waxhaw Creek; left that State in 1784; was born on the 15th of March, in the year 1767. I am truly happy to learn at what house my mother died.

I know she died near Charleston, having visited that city with several matrons to afford relief to our prisoners with the British—not her son, as you suppose, for at that time my two elder brothers were no more, but two of her nephews, William and Joseph Crawford, sons of James Crawford, then deceased. I well recollect one of the matrons that went with her was Mrs. Boyd. It is possible Mrs. Barton can inform me where she was buried, that I can find her grave. This to me would be great satisfaction that I might collect her bones and inter them with that of my father and brothers. I offer you my thanks for the political information your letter has afforded. Present me affectionately to your lady, kiss my namesake for me, and accept assurances of my high respect and regard.

Your most obedient servant,

ANDREW JACKSON.

JAMES H. WITHERSPOON, Esq.

I exhibit a photostatic copy of this letter, and any Member can see it and also the ones next hereinafter exhibited by going to the manuscript division of the Congressional Library where the originals are on file. This was in 1824. In 1828 he was addressed by a committee of citizens and invited by them to come and spend July 4 with the citizens of "your native district." This invitation was signed by Jas. H. Witherspoon, Jno. Nisbet, John Stewart, Nathaniel Barber, Jackey Perry, Sam. R. Gibson, Bartlett Jones, I. Donnom, H. Massey, sr., and Wm. McKenna, secretary. I set out herewith their letter and the answer of Gen. Jackson in which you will note that they state that he is a native of Lancaster, and he states twice that he was born in Lancaster County. The letter of the citizens is as follows:

LANCASTER, S. C., May 12, 1828.

GEN. ANDREW JACKSON.

DEAR SIR: At a large and respectable meeting of the citizens of Lancaster district held in the courthouse on the 5th instant we were appointed a committee to express to you their high sense of your many public services and in testimony of their appreciation of the same to request the pleasure of your company at a dinner in Lancasterville on the 4th day of July next, and if not convenient at that time you will please designate a day on which the citizens of your native district may enjoy the pleasure of your company. You will please accept the assurance of our sincere friendship and esteem.

JAS. H. WITHERSPOON,	SAM. R. GIBSON.
JNO. NISBET.	BARTLETT JONES.
JOHN STEWART.	I. DONNOM.
NATHANIEL BARBER.	H. MASSEY, SR.
JACKEY PERRY.	WM. MCKENNA, Secretary.

The answer of Gen. Jackson is as follows:

HERMITAGE, June 2, 1828.

GENTLEMEN: I have had the pleasure to receive your kind letter of the 12th ultimo inviting me to celebrate with the citizens of my native district the approaching anniversary of our national independence. For this pleasing testimonial of the esteem of the citizens of Lancaster I pray you, gentlemen, to offer to them the assurance of my heartfelt thanks. If it were in my power, nothing could be more grateful to my feelings than to comply with their wish, but the distance to be traveled and the various requisitions upon my time at home compel me to say that this pleasure must be postponed to some other period. Be pleased, gentlemen, to accept for yourselves individually and convey to those you represent my gratitude for your tender recollection of me as citizen of Lancaster. This obligation is heightened by the consciousness on my part that absence and time have not weakened the ardor of that sentiment which consecrates the memory of the place which gave me birth.

I have the honor to be, gentlemen,
Your obedient servant,

ANDREW JACKSON.

To Messrs. JAS. H. WITHERSPOON, etc.

The signers of the above invitation are men who were thoroughly familiar with the birthplace of Andrew Jackson. John Stewart, for instance, as is shown in Mills's History of South Carolina, page 601, lived just on the south side of Waxhaw Creek, while Jackson was born just across on the north side.

H. Massey, sr., lived exactly on the line between North and South Carolina, less than a mile from where Andrew Jackson was born, as will be seen by Mills's Atlas, and he is a near relative, so I am informed, of the Benjamin Massey whom Parton cites as saying he heard Sarah Lathan say that Jackson was born at McKemys, in North Carolina. H. Massey, sr., is here stoutly asserting over his own signature that Jackson was born in South Carolina. And there were hundreds of men who were 20 years old when Jackson was born who made up that large audience at Lancaster and appointed this committee to testify of Jackson's nativity and invite him to come back and celebrate it. It is hard to conceive that this nativity was unchallenged if it was untrue.

Recently there has been a monument put up by certain citizens of North Carolina over on the alleged location where they say he was born, and then there is a sign put up on the railroad station that you can go to a certain place and see where Andrew Jackson was born. They say that South Carolina has never made any protest against it, and therefore he was born there. Well, in 1820 it went on the maps of South Carolina that Andrew Jackson was born in South Carolina and the spot was marked on the maps, and no protest was ever made by North Carolina, and therefore I make one answer the other. [Laughter.] Why no protest from North Carolina?

Now, the men that signed this statement in the above invitation were natives of the district, and a majority of them lived within 1, 2, and 3 miles of the place where he was born, and they knew the facts and the living witnesses to prove them, and a protest from North Carolina would have been overwhelmed. But history is based on proof. The law of estoppel does not settle historical questions, and the fact that certain ladies, led on by bogus tradition and vivid imagination, put up a monument in the twentieth century does not settle where a baby was born in the eighteenth century.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. I will.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. In view of the conclusive evidence that the gentleman is producing, would not he be in favor of the Rules Committee making in order legislation that would move that monument to South Carolina? [Laughter.]

Mr. STEVENSON. That would be like Jacob's wife taking the brazen images of Laban—but I will state that if I remain on the Printing Committee when we bring out the next permanent volume of the Congressional Directory, I propose to make an effort to see that history is correctly stated in that particular.

Now, I am not through, those were only two letters, let me read some more.

The next letter of Jackson which I will cite was written December 24, 1830, to J. R. Pringle, of Charleston, in which he says (Niles's Register, vol. 39, p. 385):

Although it will be gratifying to my feelings to avail myself of so favorable an opportunity to visit the emporium of my native State, I am yet prevented by my official engagements from designating the period when I can seize it.

In 1831, in reply to a committee inviting him to Charleston to a Fourth of July celebration, he writes on June 14:

A necessary attention to the duties of my office, must deprive me of the gratification I should have had in paying, under such circumstances, a visit to the State of which I feel a pride in calling myself a citizen by birth.

On December 9, 1832, he wrote to Joel R. Poinsett, of Charleston, as follows (Stillé's Life of Poinsett, p. 64):

If the Union Party unite with you, heart and hand in the text you have laid down, you will not only preserve the Union, but save our native State, from that ruin and disgrace into which her treasonable leaders have attempted to plunge her.

Again, on December 10, 1832, he issued his nullification proclamation, in which he says:

Fellow citizens of my native State, let me not only admonish you, as the First Magistrate of our common country, not to incur the penalty of its laws, but use the influence that a father would over his children whom he saw rushing to certain ruin. (See vol. 5, p. 85, Great American Debates.)

On January 24, 1833, he wrote again to Poinsett, as follows:

I repeat again, my pride and desire is, that the Union men may arouse and sustain the majesty of the Constitution and the laws, and save my native State from that disgrace that the Nullifiers have brought upon her. (Stillé's Life of Poinsett, p. 68.)

If there ever was a time when Jackson would have repudiated his nativity in South Carolina, it was then, when he was being baited and defamed and abused, when he was being called everything on earth by the people who were attempting to nullify the laws of the National Government. If there ever was a time when the leaders of South Carolina would have been glad to wipe him off their slate and repudiate him as a native-born citizen of South Carolina, they would have done it then, when he threw in their faces that he was a native, and that he proposed to vindicate the rights of the National Government in his native State. [Applause.]

It went on then until he had gone through his stormy career, and in the shades of the Hermitage he received a copy of a resolution from the South Carolina Legislature, sent by Gov. Hammond, in which they asked that Congress take action to rescind the action and to refund the fines imposed upon him for contempt of Judge Hall's court in New Orleans, when he put Judge Hall in jail for a little while. Here is his answer to that:

Conscious as I am of the integrity and propriety of my conduct in regard to Judge Hall, it is truly grateful to my feelings to find the legislature of my native State, South Carolina, uniting with the legislature of other States in those high and honorable feelings of justice which their resolutions so plainly indicate.

That is the last deliverance by letter, and it is in the hands of the descendant of Gov. Hammond, Mr. E. Spann Hammond, at Blackville, S. C., and was published in the Sunday News, Charleston, August 7, 1904; and I cite you where you can see the originals of every one of these declarations. He then came down to the time when death was laying its hand upon him, and he sat down to make his will. Let us see what he said. He was patriotic to the bone. There is not a clause in his will that does not conduce to the conservation of the Union which was his heart's love and desire. He gave away several swords, and with each gift he enjoined the donee that it only be drawn in honorable defense of his Government, the Government of the United States, and the Union as constituted by the Constitution. His will is a remarkable document, if you will look at it. He then came down to the last and said:

The gold box presented to me by the corporation of the City of New York, the large silver vase presented to me by the ladies of Charleston, S. C., my native State, with the large picture representing the unfurling of the American banner, presented to me by the citizens of South Carolina when it was refused to be accepted by the United States Senate, I leave in trust to my son, A. Jackson, Jr., with directions that, should our happy country not be blessed with peace, an event not always to be expected, he will at the close of the war or end of the conflict present each of said articles, of inestimable value, to that patriot residing in the city or State from which they were presented who shall be adjudged by his countrymen or the ladies to have been the most valiant in defense of his country and our country's rights.

I pause here and turn aside from my manuscript just a moment to tell you something interesting regarding that bequest. The Mexican War within two years was upon us. The Palmetto Regiment of South Carolina entered the City of Mexico first and planted the banners of America upon the Castle of Chapultepec. When they came back the executor turned over to the governor of South Carolina these two emblems—a vase he called it, while as a matter of fact it is a $12,000 silver punch bowl, and we are keeping it very closely guarded now, because we do not want the Volstead folks to get it. [Laughter.] The governor called together the Palmetto Regiment and made a request of them that they determine who was the bravest man. They spent one day in endeavoring to settle that question, I am informed. Necessarily, it was a rather difficult and delicate question to settle. They came back to the governor and asked him to have the legislature provide that the State should hold these emblems in trust for all of them until the last but one was dead and then give them to him. The State held them until Gen. Sherman came down through Columbia, and his folks got the banner, but the punch bowl was so well hidden that we have it yet. It came back into the hands of the governor after the war, when it was dug up out of the sand hills of Richland County; and two or three years ago, when there were only three or four of these old veterans of the Palmetto Regiment tottering on the border of the grave, I understand they made an absolute assignment to South Carolina of all their interest in it and asked that it be held as an emblem for South Carolina of the man who threatened to spank South Carolina if she went out of the Union in 1831. That is the history of that, and you will find that vase in the historical room in Columbia, S. C., to-day.

Just one moment now as to the contemporaneous declaration. In the first place, up to 1815, when, as I said, the line was settled, this line was always designated on the maps as being the road from Lancaster, S. C., to Charlotte, N. C. And you will see it is designated there so as to show it. The convention of 1815 settled that question between the two States, and every map after that was run straight. The county of Lancaster and the State of South Carolina employed James Boykin, one of the great civil engineers of that time, whose work has been verified from start to finish, to make a map of the county of Lancaster. That was 53 years after Jackson's birth. There were hundreds of men in that country then who were 20 years old when Jackson was born. He made the survey. He put on that map the battle field of Buford's Brigade, which was cut to pieces, and the people have recognized that by putting a little monument there right on the spot where Boykin laid it out.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. STEVENSON. May I have 10 minutes more?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. SHREVE. If the gentleman will answer a question or two by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DUNBAR], he will surrender five minutes of his time to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. STEVENSON. I shall be very glad to answer any questions.

Mr. DUNBAR. The gentleman is proving or trying to prove that Andrew Jackson states he was born in South Carolina. Everybody knows and everybody concedes that he thinks he was born in South Carolina. I would be very much interested in having the gentleman prove to us that the statements which have been made that he was born in North Carolina are not well founded.

I wish the gentleman would tell us why it is that the American Encyclopedia, the International Encyclopedia, the Encyclopedia Britannica, and all the encyclopedias which have been published and which give a reference to the birth of Andrew Jackson, there is but one of them that states that he was born in South Carolina, and that is the international. The International Encyclopedia states—folk lore states—that he was born in North Carolina and Gen. Jackson himself states that he was born in South Carolina. It is the only encyclopedia which states that he was born in South Carolina. Why is it that the other—

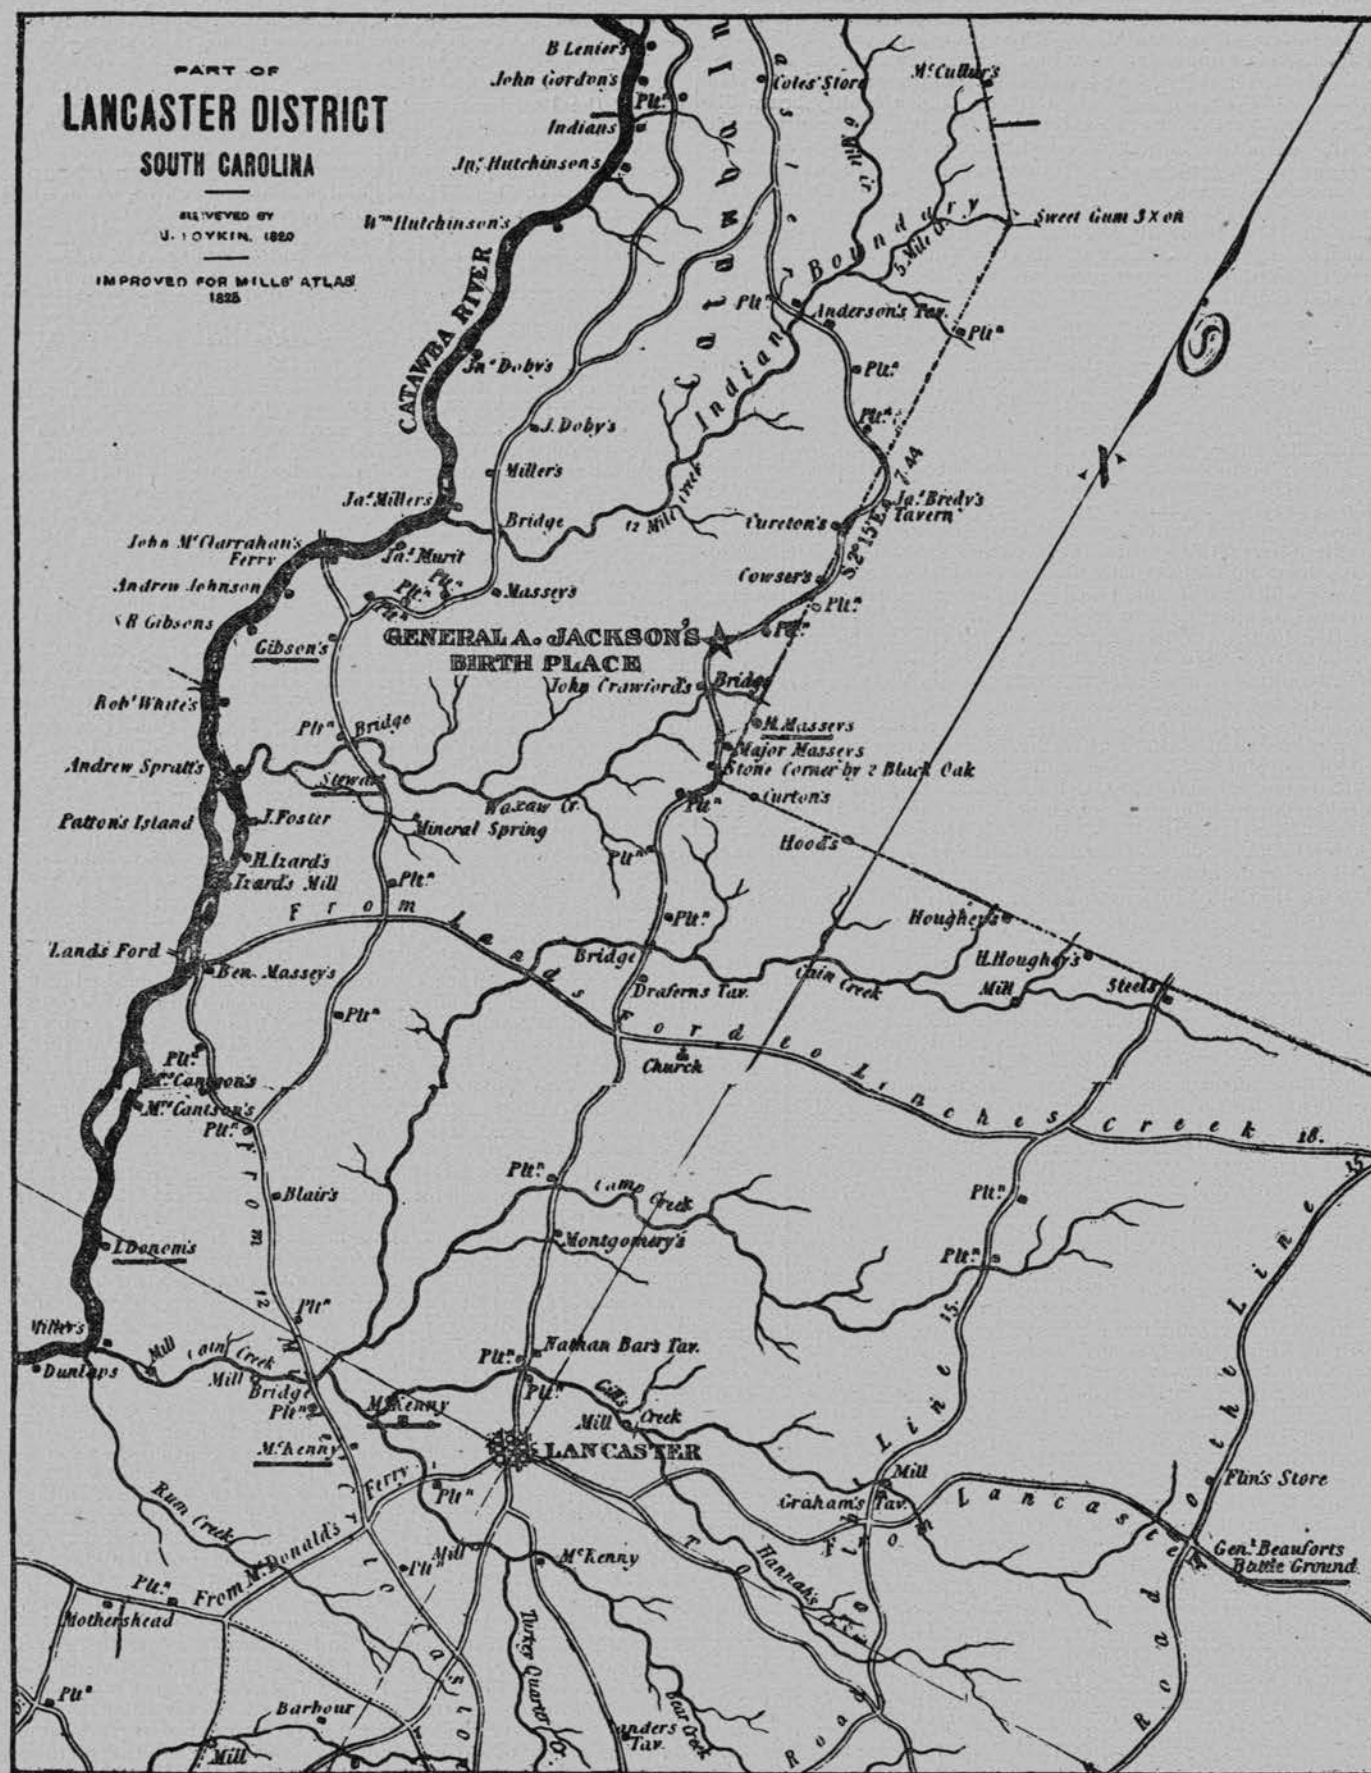

Mr. STEVENSON. If the gentleman is going to take up all of my five minutes, I have not got anywhere. [Laughter.]

Mr. DUNBAR. I will conclude. In the face of this evidence how can the gentleman accept the statement of Andrew Jackson, which we all know was only founded upon information, and it was in contradiction of the testimony of his relatives?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes; now we will come to that question. The gentlemen interrupted me before I got to it. Let us find out who had the best opportunity of seeing the real witnesses who knew when and where he was born. But I will insert in the record the statement of who these people were who in 1858 gave Mr. Parton the affidavits on which he has based his history and from which these encyclopedias have taken their statements, but which do not bear out your statement.

I say Andrew Jackson and his contemporaries saw and knew intimately the living witnesses, and the question was up and inquired into and settled in 1815, and all historians and citizens accepted the truth as settled then, and it was never challenged until 1858. Now, I cite the circumstances and other evidence.

It will be seen by Mouzon's maps, 1775, and also 1794, and Reed's maps, 1775, and Strother's map, 1808, that the road from Lancaster to Charlotte was recognized as the line by the geographers up to 1808, but in 1813, as above stated, that line was settled and every map of North and South Carolina from that time forward sets it out as a straight line and puts the road in South Carolina and all of the Crawford land in South Carolina. In 1820 the first official map of South Carolina after that settlement was made by Boykin, and I hereto append a photostatic copy of that map of Lancaster County, which was subsequently put in Mills's Atlas of South Carolina, which is on file in the Congressional Library. That map was made in 1820 and was verified and improved for Mills's Atlas in 1825. And right beside the road from Lancaster to Charlotte and on land which in the old maps was partly in North Carolina, this entry is made "Gen. Andrew Jackson's birthplace." This is the statement of the civil engineer whose work has never been successfully assailed as to any of his historical references. For instance, on the same map you have the location of the battle ground where Buford's brigade was destroyed, which is now marked by a monument, which verifies the location by Boykin. Here also properly noted is the battle ground of Hanging Rock, the first battle in which Andrew Jackson was under fire; he was there under Gen. William R. Davie. He ran this when all the men who were a few years Jackson's senior were alive. Jackson was 53 years old and then a very noted general when this map was made. And nobody can escape the conclusion that the tradition was thoroughly settled at that time and this map was made with all the evidence before him, and it was an acute issue up to that time—Reilly's map made about the same time has the same entry—it is in State historical department of South Carolina. Another declaration of contemporaneous history was that of Gen. William R. Davie, who was born in England June 20, 1756, and after 1760 was raised in the Waxhaw settlement and belonged to Waxhaw

Church, which was established by his uncle, William Richardson, Presbyterian preacher, who left him all his fortune, and knew intimately the traditions of the country, who in 1815 made the statement unequivocally that Jackson was born in Lancaster district, S. C. The letter is still extant. Davie was afterwards governor of North Carolina and a county bears his name. In 1820 James Thonaldson, of Philadelphia, presented to the legislative library of South Carolina a bust of Jackson, for the reason that South Carolina was the native State of the distinguished general, and the South Carolina Legislature in resolution accepted it, as will be seen by reference to the report of the historical commission with congratulations that the nativity of Jackson is now acknowledged as our own. Referring to the line settlement of 1815, Why no protest from North Carolina?

The dispute was supposed to be settled when they settled that line, because the only dispute then was whether Crawford's land was in North or South Carolina. There was no dispute about his being born on Crawford's land, everybody admitted that, and as late as 1846 Foote in his sketches of North Carolina, upon page 476, says:

The place in which Andrew Jackson passed his early years was claimed by North Carolina for a long time, but is within the bounds of South Carolina, as now settled by the mutual agreement of the States.

It was done in 1815. Foote states this again on page 198. That was the only question until Mr. Parton moved the place of birth from Crawford's to McKemey's by the testimony of some good old ladies who had been dead 50 years. One circumstance which is pregnant is the failure of North Carolina historians to claim him. Wheeler's history of North Carolina was written in 1845 to 1850 and published in 1851, and enumerates the men who have originated in the different counties. Under Mecklenburg County, pages 263 to 268, he names eight very prominent citizens who originated in that county, and amongst them he names James Knox Polk, native of Mecklenburg, and afterwards President of the United States, and gives quite a lengthy history of him, but he makes no claim that Andrew Jackson was a native of Mecklenburg County, and when the brethren of Mecklenburg County fail to claim a man for 75 years—85, in fact—it is pregnant evidence that they have no claim upon him. Under Union County, which had just been established, no such claim is made either.

What do the historians say? Mills's History of South Carolina, published in 1826, page 600, speaking of Lancaster County, says:

Lancaster was the birthplace of Andrew Jackson. He was born near the waters of Waxhaw Creek in this district and within a mile of the North Carolina line.

The accuracy of this historian has never been successfully assailed in any particular. Amos Kendall wrote practically an autobiography of Jackson, because he wrote it under Jackson's immediate supervision, and the first number contains a map identical with the maps set out here, with the place of Jackson's birth shown as the Crawford place, in Lancaster County, S. C., which is claimed under the authority of Gen. Jackson.

On June 27, 1845, George Bancroft, the greatest historian yet produced by America, said in his memorial address on Jackson:

South Carolina gave a birthplace to Andrew Jackson. On its remote frontier, far up on the forest-clad banks of the Catawba, in a region where settlers were just beginning to cluster, his eye first saw the light. (Bancroft, Miscellaneous Writings, p. 445.)

This memorial address was published in the leading papers of the country, and coming, as it did, from the leading historian of the country, no protest or counterstatement was issued by North Carolina, and the correctness of the statement was conceded till 1858, when Gen. Walkup and Mr. Parton promulgated the new history.

"Gadsden's Life of Jackson," published in 1824, states unequivocally that he was a native of South Carolina. No history prior to Parton's, 1859, ever asserted the contrary.

As I have already said, Wheeler's History of North Carolina does not claim him for Mecklenburg County as it does James K. Polk—and properly—and Foote's History of North Carolina states expressly twice that there was a dispute as to the place where he was brought up, but that it had been settled that it was in South Carolina. Brady's History of Jackson, published in 1902, and again in 1906, makes the statement in the text, which is the 1902 text, that Jackson was born at the McKemey house in North Carolina. This is his statement:

When Andrew Jackson, sr., died, he left his wife with two little boys and practically no property. He had not proved up his claim, and there is no evidence in the records of land transfers that he ever owned a foot of ground.

Then he speaks of Mrs. Jackson starting to her brother-in-law's, Mr. Crawford's:

On the way she stopped over night at the McKemey house, and there Andrew, Jr., was born; she was well enough to travel in three weeks, a rather long convalescence for a frontier woman of that period; leaving Hugh in the McKemey home, she journeyed to the Crawford place with Robert and the infant, Andrew.

After publishing his 1902 edition, and possibly his first edition of the 1906 book, he took up with Mr. A. S. Salley, secretary of the Historical Commission of South Carolina, and had him prepare a complete statement of the evidence in the matter, which will be found as Appendix A to the 1906 edition, and in bringing out the book he repudiates the text as to that matter, and Appendix A begins with this note:

This most interesting and valuable paper which seems to settle the question has been specially prepared for this book by Mr. A. S. Salley, Jr., secretary of the Historical Commission of South Carolina, an author of numerous historical and genealogical papers relating to southern subjects.

That is on page 407 of the appendix. On page 421 he makes this statement:

While I agree with Mr. Salley as to Jackson's birthplace, and to that extent disagree with Parton, I am compelled to make an emphatic dissent from his estimate of Parton's book as a whole.

So that Brady, when confronted with the evidence which Salley produced, repudiated the tradition found in Parton on which all the biographical dictionaries have based their statement as to Jackson's birthplace. The latest history is that of J. Spencer Bassett, now professor of history in Smith College, formerly a professor of history at Trinity College, North Carolina, at which institution I am informed he was educated; and on pages 6 and 7 of volume 1 you will find a discussion of the question with his conclusions, and I cite them, published in 1911:

To the writer the weight of evidence seems to favor the South Carolinians. The Leslie tradition rests on an old woman's account of an event which happened when she was a child of 7, an event, too, about which a child could not be well informed. It was weakly corroborated by a statement of Thomas Faulkner, aged 70; by another man, also a Leslie descendant, who relied on information which he said he had from Sarah Lathan's mother 50 years earlier; and by James D. Craig's statement that he had heard—evidently much earlier than his statement—"a very aged lady," Mrs. Cousar, say that she assisted at the birth at McKemey's house. The weakness of this evidence lies in the long time which elapsed between the event and the time of its recording. All of it must have been carried many years in the minds of two people, one passing it on when she was very old to another, who told it when he was very old. Add to this the enthusiasm which the narrators had for their story and the lack of critical examination of it when it came from their lips, place against it the clear statement of Jackson made in response to a question which this controversy aroused, that he was born in the house of James Crawford, in South Carolina, and to most men the story will probably appear doubtful. Somewhat more trustworthy is the explicit statement of Gen. Jackson.

There were numerous histories of Jackson written during his life, all of which assume that he was born in South Carolina, and his will is found in full in Frost's History, pages 500 to 502.

Parton's History is the one upon which the North Carolina tradition relies. It was published in 1859 or 1860, and is not accurate as to real legal proof on this question and on several others to which I will call attention. His conclusions depend (a) on the alleged statements of Mrs. Leslie, a midwife who had been dead 50 years when the people were making their statements as to what she said; (b) Mrs. Sarah Lathan had been dead 35 years before the statement was made. In other words, Mrs. Leslie was dead in 1808 before the original controversy as to the line from the gum at Twelve-Mile Creek to the stone at Waxhaw Creek had been settled; and Mrs. Lathan had been dead at least since 1823, according to the testimony of the folks who gave their statements; and one witness stated that he had heard (c) Mrs. Cousar make the statement, who had been dead possibly 75 years. She must therefore have been dead since 1783; and, finally (d) what they heard James Faulkner say Jackson said, which was that James Faulkner—who had then been dead 40 or 50 years—said that Jackson told him while they were sleeping together in the McKemey House that he was born in that house. Now, Parton says that Jackson believed he was born in South Carolina, but that he did not know any better, not knowing where he was born. James Faulkner says, if we believe him, that Jackson did know where he was born, and hence Parton has discredited one of his most material witnesses because he evidently does not believe Faulkner. If Faulkner was right, that Jackson knew where he was born, the folks who brought down the tradition merely forgot which place Faulkner said Jackson said he was born. So we can not place a finding on the testimony of Faulkner because Parton himself repudiates Faulkner's statement and says that Jackson did not know where he was born. He certainly can not ask us then to believe Faulkner—that he was born in McKemey's house.

Then coming to the statements of the other witnesses, John Lathan, a son of Sarah, who says she attended the birth at midnight when only 7 years of age (p. 54 of Parton), testifies that soon after Jackson's father died Mrs. Jackson left

Twelve Mile Creek to go and live with Mrs. Crawford in Lancaster district, South Carolina; that on her way she called at the house of George McKemey, and while at McKemey's she was taken sick and Andrew was born, and as soon as she was able to travel she went to Crawford's. Let us lay that beside Parton's conclusion. He says on page 52:

The bereaved family of the Jackson's never returned to their home on the banks of Twelve Mile Creek, but went from the burial yard to the house, not very far off, of Mrs. Jackson's brother-in-law, George McKemey by name.

Now, his (Lathan) witnesses say that they did return to the Jackson home and were removing to Crawford's when they stopped at McKemey's. Parton thereby discredits Mrs. Leslie and Mrs. Lathan, and without them he can do nothing. Then to increase the contradiction Parton brings up one Charles Finly, who is said while in the flesh to have said that he took the Jackson family to the burial and then conveyed them to the residence of George McKemey where Andrew was soon afterwards born (see p. 55). This contradicts the statement of Sarah Lathan, the most numerous quoted witness, and also contradicts James Faulkner, both of whom say that Mrs. Jackson returned to her home, and while moving from Twelve Mile Creek to Crawford's stopped with her sister, Mrs. McKemey, and was there delivered of Andrew (p. 54). So the two most material witnesses produced by Parton are contradicted by Parton and his other witness Finly, and their story is discarded as being incidental to the removal to the Crawford's.

The most reasonable theory is to adopt Parton's statement that Mrs. Jackson went to her sister's, not far off, from the burial of her husband, and that sister was Mrs. Crawford. It was possibly a mile and a half or two miles from the graveyard to Mrs. Crawford's; it was 2½ miles farther to Mrs. McKemey's (see Tompkins' "History Mecklenburg County," vol. 2, p. 5), so that I assume that she did go as Parton says, to her brother-in-law's, not far off, to wit, James Crawford, and there Andrew was born.

There is another view which should be given here. Mr. D. A. Tompkins, of Charlotte, N. C., has written a history of Mecklenburg County, and at page 188 of volume 1 it has a picture of the McKemey cottage. It is 20 feet by 16, log cabin with a door, two windows, one fireplace, and one room, which room, like all pioneer cottages, was used in front for sitting room, kitchen, and dining room, and the back was used for a bedroom in which the whole family slept. McKemey had a family; we do not know how many, but we know there were children. If the story is true, Mrs. Jackson was there with two boys, making McKemey and his wife and probably two or three children, and Mrs. Jackson and two boys, and old Mrs. Cousar, if we accept the tradition, all in that small house when this distressing period came on—when Mrs. Leslie, the mother of Sarah, was called in to officiate at Andrew's birth. Now Sarah's testimony as brought down by tradition is that she went with her mother at night to this little cabin, already full of people to overflowing, to be present at the birth of another addition to the human race. I was raised among the country Scotch-Irish people myself, and instead of bringing children in from the neighborhood to attend occurrences of that kind, even where there was an abundance of room, the children that belonged at the place were always sent away from home. And it is patently absurd to think that Mrs. Leslie, knowing the conditions there were at the McKemey house, should have taken her little 7-year-old daughter along to be an incumbrance and in the way of everybody there. It is simply an old wives' fable.

There is another thing to which I want to call attention as to the exuberance of traditional testimony which Gen. Walkup found in that neighborhood and upon which Parton bases his history. He says on page 62:

I was also assured that young Jackson attended the famous school of Dr. Waddell, one of whose pupils was Calhoun, and was inclined to believe the story until I discovered that Dr. Waddell did not open his academy until after Jackson had left school forever.

This rumor failed to get in as history, because Mr. Parton had an absolute check on it and found that it was contrary to the truth. Nevertheless, people in that country still tell it and believe it, just as they do this story as to his birth at McKemey's. Mr. Parton says that "the old people of that community scout the idea that Andrew Jackson's father ever owned any land" (p. 100 of his book). This is another of the uncertain traditions brought us by Mr. Parton and discounts the reliability of his statements. Andrew Jackson, sr., did enter his land on Twelve Mile Creek; he did not get a grant of it because he did not live long enough to do so. The James Crawford grant was not made until 1775, although Parton says that that land was bought in 1765. But Andrew Jackson, sr., acquired such an equity in the land on Twelve Mile Creek that his son and only surviving heir made conveyance of it in 1792 to one Shared

Gray, as evidenced by the power of attorney which I hereby submit, which is on record in Lancaster County, S. C., being recorded on January 2, 1793, for the reason that Crawford lived in Lancaster, and even as to that tract of land it was so uncertain as to whether it was in North or South Carolina that it was deemed best to record the power of attorney in Lancaster County, S. C. Parton says (p. 49) that Gen. Walkup reached the conclusion that old Andrew Jackson had nothing because he had searched the records in Anson and Mecklenburg Counties; if he had searched some in Lancaster County, he might have found something that would have interested him; and if he had searched some for evidence as to the place of Jackson's birth in Lancaster County instead of where he did, amongst the people who had a pride in North Carolina, he would have found evidence corroborative of our case there. (See Buell, vol. 1, pp. 22, 33.)

The power of attorney is as follows:

POWER OF ATTORNEY, ANDREW JACKSON TO JAMES CRAWFORD.

To all to whom these presents shall come, Andrew Jackson, of the county of Davidson and district of Mero, in the territory of the United States of America, south of the river Ohio, sends greeting:

Know ye that for divers good causes and considerations me thereunto moving, I have made, constituted, and appointed, and by these presents do make, constitute, and appoint, James Crawford, of the county of Lancaster, in the State of South Carolina, my true and lawful attorney for me and in my name and for my use to ask, demand, sue for, recover, and receive all sums of money, debts, dues, or demands whatsoever which are or may be due, owing, and payable to me, and on receipt thereof sufficient receipts, acquittances, and discharges for me and in my name make, execute, and deliver and more particularly to make over and convey unto Shared Gray by lease and release a sufficient title in fee simple to 200 acres of land situate, lying, and being in Mecklenburg County, in the State of North Carolina, and on the Waters of Twelve Mile Creek; and every other act and acts, deed or deeds necessary to be done in the premises do as fully and amply as I might or could do were I personally present, hereby ratifying and confirming all that my said attorney shall lawfully do in the premises. In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my seal the 28th day of November, in the year of our Lord 1792.

ANDREW JACKSON. [L. S.]

In the presence of—
ABRM. BOYD.

SOUTH CAROLINA, Lancaster County:

Abraham Boyd came before me and made oath that he was present and saw Andrew Jackson, of the county of Davidson and district of Mero, in the territory of the United States of America, south of the river Ohio, sign, seal, and acknowledge the within power of attorney to James Crawford, of the county of Lancaster and State of South Carolina, for the uses and purposes therein contained, and that he, this deponent, signed his name as a witness thereto at the same time.

ABRAHAM BOYD.

Sworn to December 26, 1792, before me.

JNO. SIMPSON, J. L. C. C.

Recorded January 2, 1793.

STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA, County of Lancaster:

I, Paul Moore, clerk of the court of common pleas and general sessions in and for said county, do hereby certify that the above and foregoing is a true and correct copy of a power of attorney executed by Andrew Jackson to James Crawford, as shown by the record of the same in my office in deed book B, at page 227. Given under my hand and official seal at Lancaster this 16th day of February, 1922.

PAUL MOORE,
Clerk of Court.

Mr. HAMMER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. I will.

Mr. HAMMER. I desire to ask the gentleman if Mr. Parton is not considered one of the most painstaking of historians?

Mr. STEVENSON. He is by some people, no doubt. Specially with North Carolinians.

Mr. HAMMER. Mr. Collier, who wrote the authentic history of Gen. Jackson, who was a life-long friend of Mr. Jackson, did not know where he was born.

Mr. STEVENSON. Jackson said that he was born in South Carolina, and said it over his own signature, and he knew more about what he knew than Collier did.

Mr. HAMMER. I would like to ask the gentleman if Gen. Walkup did not make an investigation of 18 witnesses, about one-third living in South Carolina—

Mr. STEVENSON. Gentlemen, I can not—

Mr. HAMMER. And did not they overwhelmingly furnish the testimony that has been uncontroverted?

Mr. STEVENSON. You can not take any more of my time.

Gen. Walkup got 18 affidavits, but what were they? Eighteen affidavits as to what Sarah Lathan, James Faulkner, and Mrs. Cousar and old Mrs. Leslie and Mr. Finly said, and all of them had been dead 35 years, and most of them 50 or 60. You trace it back to those five people, and they do not agree. Eighteen people in 1858 stated what they had been told by people who had been dead, all of them, for more than a half century, except one, who had been dead 35 years, to contradict people who spoke while many living people knew the facts.

I want to show you how unreliable Mr. Parton was. Gen. Walkup states that Andrew Jackson never had any land.

The trouble is he did just what he did as to where he was born—he did not look in the right place.

I have put in here the power of attorney executed by Andrew Jackson in 1792, in which he conveys to one Shared Gray 200 acres of land in Mecklenburg County, in North Carolina, on the waters of Twelve Mile Creek. That is the land that his father took up, just on the line, but in North Carolina.

Parton and Walkup say there was no such land, and they could not find any trace of it. And here I produce a record of a power of attorney from Jackson himself, conveying it away in 1792 and recorded in Lancaster County, S. C., on the 2d day of January, 1793. And it shows you the absolute unreliability of the witnesses relied on by Mr. Parton, because he says not only positively that Gen. Walkup says that the old man never had any land there, but he says positively that all these people he saw down there scouted the idea that the old man ever had any, and that it was all a myth. And yet I here produce the record over Andrew Jackson's signature that he did have it, and gives the lie to that which Parton got up and which he spread all over this country. These people told him that Jackson went to school to Waddill. He believed it till he found it untrue. They told him the old man had no land. He believed it, and I show it is untrue. They told him Mrs. Jackson went back home after she buried her husband, and he repudiated that in his own text. How can history be accepted out of their mouths? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

EXHIBIT A.

(Report of the Historical Commission of South Carolina to the General Assembly of South Carolina at the regular session of 1908.)

"The roots of the present lie deep in the past, and nothing in the past is dead to the man who would learn how the present came to be what it is." (Stubbs.)

"A people who have not the pride to record their history will not long have the virtue to make history that is worth recording." (R. D. W. Connor.)

THE BIRTHPLACE OF ANDREW JACKSON (1767-1845).

During the lifetime of Andrew Jackson it was almost universally accepted that he was born in South Carolina, but of recent years it has come to be widely believed that he was born in North Carolina. The encyclopedias and biographers either state that his birthplace is a matter of doubt or that it was in North Carolina. But the most impartial and acceptable evidence all points to a well-defined spot in South Carolina as his birthplace.

Jackson himself repeatedly declared that he was born in South Carolina, and actually fixed the spot upon a map, and his is the only evidence we have before us that would be admissible in a court of law.

In a letter, dated at Washington, December 24, 1830, replying to a letter from J. R. Pringle, intendant of Charleston, inviting him to visit Charleston, he wrote:

"Although it will be gratifying to my feelings to avail myself of so favorable an opportunity to visit the emporium of my native State, I am yet prevented by my official engagements from designating the period when I can seize it."

To the committee of arrangements for the celebration of the Fourth of July by the people of Charleston in 1831, President Jackson wrote in a letter dated at Washington, June 14, 1831:

"A necessary attention to the duties of my office must deprive me of the gratification I should have had in paying under such circumstances a visit to the State of which I feel a pride in calling myself a citizen by birth."

In a letter to Joel R. Poinsett, of Charleston, another native of South Carolina, dated at Washington, December 9, 1832, he wrote:

"If the Union Party unite with you heart and hand in the text you have laid down, you will not only preserve the Union but save our native State from that ruin and disgrace into which her treasonable leaders have attempted to plunge her."

In his proclamation of December 10, 1832, anent the "nullification" convention of South Carolina, he used this language:

"Fellow citizens of my native State, let me not only admonish you, as the First Magistrate of our common country, not to incur the penalty of its laws, but use the influence that a father would over his children whom he saw rushing to certain ruin."

Again, in a letter to Poinsett, dated at Washington, January 24, 1833, he wrote:

"I repeat again my pride and desire is that the Union men may arouse and sustain the majesty of the Constitution and the laws and save my native State from that disgrace that the nullifiers have brought upon her."

In a letter to Gov. Hammond, of South Carolina, dated at the Hermitage, January 13, 1843, he wrote:

"Conscious as I am of the integrity and propriety of my conduct in regard to Judge Hall, it is truly grateful to my feelings to find the legislature of my native State, South Carolina, uniting with the legislatures of other States in those high and honorable feelings of justice which their resolutions so plainly indicate."

And, finally, in his last will and testament, Gen. Jackson declared that South Carolina was his native State. He said:

"The large silver vase presented to me by the ladies of Charleston, S. C., my native State, with the large picture representing the unfurling of the American banner presented to me by citizens of South Carolina, when it was refused to be accepted by the United States Senate, I leave in trust to my son, A. Jackson, jr., with directions that should our happy country not be blessed with peace, an event not always to be expected, he will at the close of the war or end of the conflict present each of said articles of inestimable value to that patriot residing in the city or State from which they were presented who shall be adjudged by his countrymen, or the ladies, to have been the most valiant in defense of his country and our country's rights."

Here are seven direct statements from Jackson that he was a native of South Carolina. As to the location of the spot in South Carolina whereon stood the house in which he was born the following evidence is offered:

In 1843 Amos Kendall, one of Jackson's closest personal friends—in fact, so close that during Jackson's occupation of the office of President he was credited by Jackson's political opponents with being the "power behind the throne" and, as a member of the little coterie of Jackson's personal friends and advisers, was contemptuously referred to as of the "kitchen cabinet"—published several parts of a life of Jackson, which was, unfortunately, never completed. That work was prepared so much under Jackson's eye that it might almost be called an autobiography. It contained a map showing what Jackson regarded as the exact site of his birth. The evidence given on that map is confirmed by four earlier maps. The first of these is a plat to a grant of land made to Robert Crawford by the governor of that Province of South Carolina in 1775. The plantation so granted contained 620 acres, and lay along Waxhaw Creek, with the line between the Provinces of North Carolina and South Carolina as the eastern boundary.

The certificate to the plat recites that the tract had previously been granted to Andrew Pickens by the governor of North Carolina under the misapprehension that it lay within the bounds of North Carolina. At the time of Jackson's birth the line between the two Provinces at this point had not been agreed upon or blazed out. In 1764 Gov. Bull had directed that a straight line connecting a gum tree on Twelve Mile Creek with a stone about a mile south of Waxhaw Creek should be considered the line until an agreement should be reached. In 1772 this line was officially agreed to, and by that agreement the land whereon Crawford then lived was shown to be South Carolina territory, and was then formally granted to Crawford, who had doubtless been on it for some years. In 1808 the States of North Carolina and South Carolina entered into a conventional agreement for definitely fixing the boundary line between the two States at certain points. One of these points was the 8-mile line referred to above. In 1813 the commissioners and surveyors appointed by the two States ran, blazed out, and made a map of the line. This map shows the landmarks along the line. On the plantation granted to Robert Crawford in 1775 two houses were shown on this map, those of J. Crawford and R. Crawford. In 1820 the State of South Carolina began the compilation of a series of maps of the districts of the State under the supervision of Robert Mills, the great American engineer. The contract for surveying and making a map of Lancaster district was given to J. Boykin, a native of that section of the State and a surveyor of wide reputation. His map fixes "Gen. A. Jackson's birthplace" on the Crawford plantation exactly where the map made under Gen. Jackson's direction in 1843 placed it. Before publishing Mr. Mills sent a proof of the map to Gen. Jackson, who wrote back that the birthplace thereon given was correct; that he was born on the Crawford place. In the same year (1820) Eugene Reilly, "surveyor and engineer," delineated a map of Lancaster district, differing from Boykin's map as regards landmarks, but placing "Gen. Jackson's birthplace" exactly where Boykin placed it.

In 1820 Mr. James Thowaldson, of Philadelphia, presented to the legislative library of South Carolina a bust of Jackson. A committee was appointed by the general assembly to draft resolutions of thanks. Embodied in their resolutions is this significant statement:

"With so many themes of admiration and causes of gratitude in the history of the general, we, as Carolinians, have a still more happy reason for gratulation that he, whose nativity has been the cause of rivalry for contending States, is acknowledged as our own."

Evidently the committee had had some conclusive evidence as to Jackson's birthplace furnished to them whereupon they based that statement. There is still another bit of secondary evidence to prove that Jackson very well knew the place of his birth. In 1858 some contention arose as to the place of his birth, and the Lancaster Ledger published an article on the subject. The following paragraph from that paper is to the point:

"But the testimony rests not here. Many years ago it was mooted whether Gen. Jackson was born in this State or just over the line in North Carolina. Col. James H. Witherspoon, then a prominent citizen of this district and intimate friend of Jackson's, addressed to him a letter of inquiry as to his birthplace. The reply of Gen. Jackson was full and particular. He states that he was born in the Waxhaws, in South Carolina, on a place belonging to Maj. Crawford. This letter is now in the hands of James H. Witherspoon, Esq., son of the late Col. James H. Witherspoon, to whom it was addressed. Unfortunately, Mr. Witherspoon is on a summer tour among the highlands, and we are consequently deprived of the pleasure of laying it before our readers."

This letter is now in the Library of Congress, and is cited by J. S. Bassett in his life of Jackson.

Perhaps this was the evidence upon which the committee of the general assembly based its statement in 1820. At any rate, all of Jackson's statements are to the effect that he was born in South Carolina on Robert Crawford's plantation. The rules of evidence permit a man to testify as to the time and place of his birth. In certain circumstances hearsay evidence as to the time of a child's birth is admissible, but not hearsay evidence as to the place of the child's birth. There is no evidence within the reach of the general investigator to contradict Jackson save that of several witnesses who have given testimony from hearsay and tradition that Jackson was born at the house of one George McKemey, a relative. There is not one single direct statement from anyone that he or she knew of his or her own knowledge of the place where Jackson was born, as all of this hearsay testimony was offered long after Jackson and all of his elders and contemporaries were dead. There is a tract of land lying within the bounds of North Carolina and about 3 miles from the Crawford place that belonged to George McKemey at the time of Jackson's birth, as shown by the public records of Mecklenburg County, but that is no proof that Jackson was born there, or even that he was born in McKemey's house, and the fact that McKemey owned that tract of land in 1767 is not sufficient proof that he lived upon it at the time of Jackson's birth, even admitting that Jackson was born in McKemey's house, as claimed by this made-to-order tradition.

On the other hand, we have a statement by one of Jackson's early neighbors, who doubtless knew him well from infancy to young manhood, when he went to Tennessee, and who was considerably older than Jackson, that he was born in South Carolina. This was Gen. William R. Davie, who spent many years of his life in the neighborhood in which Jackson was born, and who was some time governor of North Carolina. He was appealed to in 1815 by a native of Lancaster district then residing in Charleston, who made the following statement to Gen. Davis:

"Much has been said here relative to the birthplace of Gen. Jackson. I have stated that he is a native of Lancaster, in this State."

To this Gen. Davis replied:

"Your statement respecting Gen. Jackson is perfectly correct; he was born in what is usually called the Waxhaw."

Gen. Jackson had half a dozen or more biographers who wrote during his lifetime, at least four of whom were his intimate friends—John Reid, John H. Eaton, Gen. James Gadsden, William Cobbett, Goodwin and Amos Kendall—and every one of them credited him to South Carolina, as did hundreds of newspaper and magazine writers of his day; so did the official publications of South Carolina and other States, such as legislative reports and resolutions and journals; and when he died very many editors and eulogists, including the great historian Bancroft, spoke of him as a native of South Carolina, yet 15 years later, after his contemporaries had passed away and proofs had disappeared, new claimants arrived on the field to claim him as a native of North Carolina. But the evidence is against them, and South Carolina should "acknowledge him as our own" and place a lasting marker on the spot where he first saw the light. (For further discussion of this matter, see Appendix A to Brady's Life of Jackson.)

A. S. SALLEY, Jr.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the very able and convincing speech of our colleague from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON]. We have just been told that a reply is to be made at a later date by our colleague, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HAMMER].

I think it worthy of observation to say at this particular time, and without any intention of becoming involved in the controversy between these gentlemen and the two great States of North and South Carolina as to the birthplace of Andrew Jackson, that as soon as he reached the age of discretion he moved to the great old Volunteer State of Tennessee. [Laughter and applause.] By doing that he displayed most excellent judgment. [Applause.] He lived in Tennessee during all the years of his great record as a soldier and statesman and of his enduring service to his country. He settled in middle Tennessee, near Nashville, which is located in the district I have the honor to represent, and where his splendid old historic home, the Hermitage, now stands, maintained as he left it by the loving care and the patriotism of the noblest women who ever lived, under the name of the Ladies' Hermitage Association. [Applause.]

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CHALMERS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to print in 8-point type an address which I delivered on day before yesterday before the Press Club of Chicago.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to print in the Record an address, as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHALMERS. That address was on the subject of the American seaway. It is a subject that ought to interest every Member of this Congress. I want to print in the Record this address on the American seaway, which will give relief to the great Middle West and the West in the reduction of the high freight rates which the business of this country is suffering from now. It will reduce freight rates radically downward if we give adequate water transportation. I think we ought to look right now at this problem, which is one of the biggest things that is coming before this Congress.

I introduced a bill here a short time ago that is now before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, with a report by the International Joint Commission, a committee presided over by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WINSLOW], in the House of Representatives, presided over by our honored Speaker [Mr. GILLETTE], a gentleman from Massachusetts. In the Senate the report was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, presided over by Mr. LODGE, a Senator from Massachusetts, and the Senate itself is presided over by the Vice President, Mr. COOLIDGE, from Massachusetts. So, you see, all eyes are turned toward Massachusetts, from whence cometh our light.

Mr. GARNER. Under those circumstances, does the gentleman expect much action?

Mr. CHALMERS. Oh, yes; they will give us action. I want to say that the report of the International Joint Commission has now been printed, and I hope the Members of the House will avail themselves of the opportunity to study this question, the biggest thing that is coming before the Sixty-seventh Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Following is the address referred to:

ADDRESS DELIVERED BEFORE THE PRESS CLUB OF CHICAGO ON FEBRUARY 21, 1922, BY HON. WILLIAM W. CHALMERS.

THE AMERICAN SEAWAY.

"One thirty-ninth of the people of this great Republic live within the limits of the city of Chicago. No city in the world to-day has made the civic progress that Chicago has made in the past half century. Fifty years ago last summer Chicago was laid in ruins. Well do I remember as a lad of 8 years of age, living on the eastern shores of Lake Michigan, seeing the black clouds of smoke roll up, heralding to your neighbors the destruction of your city. With the barriers burned away you have erected here on the site of the ruins, built by the patience, perseverance, and industry of your people, a city which in the resultant of all its factors make it the greatest in the world. I refer to the factors of opportunity, location, art, commerce, and industry. You have had a remarkable growth. In 60 years you have grown from 109,000 people to over 2,700,000 population. This growth has been a world's record; but let me warn you that unless you secure speedy transportation relief your growth will not only cease but you will begin to retrograde. The very growth of your commerce will smother you.

"The very growth of your business will bring commercial drowsiness, will put your civic organization asleep. Asleep because of restricted business circulation. The human organism attains its full stature through circulation through its veins and arteries. The channels of transportation are the veins and arteries of national and civic life.

"The railroads, the waterways, the electric tramways, and motor highways are the channels through which the commercial lifeblood of our Nation flows. If these veins become clogged, it brings on commercial drowsiness and business stagnation. That is what is the matter with this country to-day.

"I know that this is true. You active business men know it is true. Those of us who lived through the crest of the highest wave of prosperity of the spring and early summer of 1920, and then saw the business life of our beloved country hesitate, droop, wither, grow sick, and die for lack of transportation relief feel like crying out a warning. We feel like advocating and providing relief, so that when the country is again brought back to normalcy, and the peak load comes at the height of national prosperity, water transportation will act as the safety valve to care for the expansion and will keep the railroads from breaking under the strain of transportation demands which are many years beyond their capacity. With the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence improvement completed, a shipload of merchandise could be sent from a dock in Chicago to any ocean port in Europe before a loaded freight car could be moved from Buffalo to New York City under the freight congestion of the winter of 1920.

"At the Detroit hearing last spring I heard a Government engineer say that during 1919 and 1920 they found cars that had been on the road so long that on the contents the dust and dirt had collected, and that the rain had fallen and that vegetation had grown 2 feet high before the car had reached its destination. He said that they had found loaded freight cars on sidetracks where birds had built nests on the trucks, the mother bird had laid her eggs, hatched her young, and departed with her brood before the switching crew had seen fit to depart with the car and send it on its way toward its destination. These were some of the rail delays reported by a United States officer at the Detroit hearing.

"It is not so with water shipments. Tear down the barriers and open the Great Lakes ports to the sea and we will show you what service is. Do you know that we have the most modern and most scientific loading and unloading facilities in the world?

"In September of this year the D. G. Kerr broke all records in loading at the Two Harbors dock in Minnesota. She loaded 12,382 gross tons of iron ore in 16½ minutes. She was at the dock only 19 minutes. Less than 20 minutes from the time she arrived at the dock she was headed down the lake with full cargo. She also broke the world's record in unloading five days later at Conneaut, Ohio. She was entirely relieved of the 12,382 tons of freight in three hours and five minutes.

"Contrast that service with the port of New York. A recent editorial in a New York daily says that it costs 24 cents to bring a bushel of potatoes from Michigan to the Hudson River in New Jersey, but 47 cents and four days to bring them across the river and over the docks and piers to the Manhattan consumer. The trouble with progress in the past has been that we Americans have been taught to read, write, and spell in rail transportation terms only. Other nations have kept waterways apace with their rail routes. We do not understand that language. We regard commerce from the rail standpoint only. We do our commercial thinking in the language of railroads.

"Now, I shall state a proposition which, when demonstrated, will place every business man in the Great Lakes-Mississippi Valley region behind this project. That is what we want from now on, men and women interested in this proposition, with enough interest to write to their Congressmen and Senators advocating this project. Tell the Representatives to vote for the Chalmers bill now before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, known as House joint resolution No. 262, which reads as follows:

[67th Cong., 2d sess.]

"IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
January 20, 1922.

"Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 262) providing for the establishment of an international board to have jurisdiction of the construction, operation, and control of the improvement of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway.

"Whereas in the treaties now in force between the United States of America and Great Britain, namely, the Webster-Ashburton treaty of 1842, the reciprocity treaty of 1854, the treaty of Washington of 1871, and the treaty of Washington of 1909, it is provided that the St. Lawrence River shall forever remain free and open for the purpose of commerce to the citizens of the United States; and

"Whereas the treaty of Washington of January 11, 1909, provides for the organization of the International Joint Commission; and

"Whereas the river and harbor act approved March 2, 1919, provided that the International Joint Commission should investigate what further improvement of the St. Lawrence River between Montreal and Lake Ontario is necessary to make the same navigable for ocean-going vessels, together with the estimated cost thereof, with its recommendation for the cooperation by the United States with the Dominion of Canada in the improvement of said river; and

"Whereas on January 21, 1920, in what is known as the reference, the Secretary of State requested the International Joint Commission to investigate what further improvement in the St. Lawrence River between Montreal and Lake Ontario is necessary to make the same navigable for deep-draft vessels of either the Lake or ocean-going type, and what draft of water is recommended, and the estimated cost; and

"Whereas on January 21, 1920, the Secretary of State in said reference asked the Board of Engineers to take charge of the survey of the St. Lawrence River from Montreal to Lake Ontario for the purpose of preparing plans and estimates for its further improvement to make the same navigable for deep-draft vessels of either the Lake or ocean-going type, and to obtain the greatest beneficial use of these waters; and

"Whereas in July, 1921, the Board of Engineers unanimously recommended the improvement of said waterway for navigation and power purposes; and

"Whereas the International Joint Commission on January 10, 1922, recommended to the Government of the United States and the Dominion of Canada the completion of the New Welland Canal, connecting Lake Erie and Lake Ontario, and the improvement of the St. Lawrence River from Lake Ontario to the sea for navigation and power purposes: Now therefore be it

"Resolved, etc., That an international board be established, composed of six members, three on the part of the United States, one appointed by the President thereof, one by the President of the Senate, and one by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and three on the part of Great Britain.

"Resolved further, That the international board shall have jurisdiction of the construction, operation, and control of the improvement of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway from Lake Erie to Lake Ontario, and from Lake Ontario to the sea, providing for a channel 30 feet deep, and shall determine the final plans for the construction of the improvement for navigation and power purposes.

"Resolved further, That one-half of the cost of the construction, maintenance, and operation of the navigation and power works shall be borne by the United States of America and one-half by the Dominion of Canada.

"Resolved further, That one-half of the hydroelectric power generated by the construction of this work shall be credited to the United States of America and one-half to the Dominion of Canada, and that the international board shall supervise the control, use, and sale of the power thus made available.

"Resolved further, That the expenditure of the sum of $1,000,000 is hereby authorized to be paid from funds not otherwise appropriated, to be under the control of the American section of the international board, to be transferred to the control of the international board when completed by the legal appointment of the Canadian section of the said international board and the appropriation of an equal amount of money by the Dominion of Canada. This joint appropriation is to be used by the international board for organization purposes and to start the work until additional funds are made available.

"Resolved further, That the international board is hereby authorized to issue bonds, guaranteed by the United States of America and Great Britain, in an amount necessary to pay for the construction of the navigation and power works.

"An examination of the treaties now in force between the United States and Canada shows that the treaty provisions are ample to guarantee to the nationals of the high contracting parties that the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterways shall remain forever free. The treaty of 1871, adopted the year of the Chicago fire, contains the following provision:

"ART. XXVI. The navigation of the River St. Lawrence, ascending and descending, from the forty-fifth parallel of north latitude, where it ceases to form the boundary line between the two countries, from, to, and into the sea, shall forever remain free and open for the purpose of commerce to the citizens of the United States, subject to any laws and regulations of Great Britain, or of the Dominion of Canada, not inconsistent with such privilege of free navigation.

"The Chalmers bill also provides for the organization of an international board, as recommended by the International Joint Commission, this board to determine plans, let construction contracts, issue bonds, sell power, and provide for operation and maintenance of both navigation and power works. The bonds to cover the cost of construction will probably be issued and held by a holding corporation representing the two Governments on an equal basis, organized similar to the Food Administration or the United States Sugar Equalization Board, which was a body corporate under the laws of the State of Delaware and of which the President was the sole stockholder as trustee for the American people.

"Under the Chalmers bill the international board may be made stockholders and trustees for the two nations. The guaranteed bonds for the construction of the works may be issued in the name of this holding corporation, and when the profit from the sale of power has redeemed the bonds this international corporation, under the trusteeship of the international board, may become a source of great profit to the two contracting nations. In fact, at that time it is my prediction that the sale of this five or six million hydroelectric horsepower will be the largest single source of income to the United States and Canada.

"The International Joint Commission recommend the completion of power works in the fourth division only. This makes available 1,464,000 horsepower. At the proper time I shall recommend to Congress that the power works be completed in the second division also, at an added expense of $151,688,000. This will make available for the market at the completion of this project 3,024,000 hydroelectric horsepower.

"I shall also recommend that in addition to the completion of a 30-foot channel at this time the locks and other structures be built for a possible depth of 40 feet at an estimated cost of four and one-half million dollars. This depth would accommodate the largest boats of the future. The Leviathan draws 38½ feet of water when she is loaded. Then, in the future, when this seaway is enlarged to conform to the requirements of the deepest channels anywhere, none of the proposed works will need to be torn down. My friends, everyone who is connected with the promotion of this enterprise will have his name go down on the honor roll in the record of the history of commercial progress in this country.

"The engineers have wisely provided the right of way, the building of bridges and approaches for a final canal width of 450 feet, the widest restricted waterway in the world. Should the present proposed canal be deepened to 40 feet the bottom width would be 160 feet. When the Suez Canal was built it was only 70 feet wide. The St. Lawrence will be 220 feet wide at the 25-foot depth and 200 feet wide at 30 feet, 180 feet at 35 feet, and 160 feet at 40 feet deep, and it will have all permanent works built for a width of 450 feet.

"The West must find its way to the sea or settle down into a secondary position commercially and industrially. Examine the pages of history and you will find that more wars have been fought, more blood has been shed over the question of an outlet to the sea than over any other problem. It has been the ever-present desire of humanity since the dawn of the ages to have a seacoast. If all the landlocked countries of Europe had possessed an adequate seacoast there would have been no World War.

"Let me pause here to warn the Empire State and its little coterie of jealous Atlantic ports, including the two from Canada—Montreal and Quebec—that their propaganda of poisonous gas, 'closed season,' 'icebergs,' 'fog,' and 'insurance rates' will avail them naught. We are in this fight to a finish. It is a case of 'Sil Fitch' with us. Our backs are to the wall. We are fighting for business life or death. Win, and we live, grow, prosper, become the most favored section. Lose, and we hesitate, stagnate, wither, and perish as commercial leaders and become slaves to the favored ports and their allies, the railroad-transportation magnates. Unless relief comes the West will be bled white by that deadly leech, high freight rates.

"After a careful study and a clear understanding of the plan proposed and recommended, so simple, so easy of construction, and with such small financial outlay, in my opinion it is an international crime that the project was not completed decades ago.

"To solve the problem of transportation for 28 States would lift the burdens from the railroads and other systems of transportation so that there would be no breakdown when the peak load comes. In other words, water transportation would relieve the excessive demands at times of great stress, just as relief and elasticity have come to the financial demands at crop-moving times by the act organizing the Federal reserve banks and the revision of the banking laws.

"The successful peoples of the earth have been masters of the deep. During all time the prosperous nations of the world have been those who have made the ocean their first transportation unit. Just now the United States is coming into its own. We have ships to make our merchant marine the greatest and most efficient on the seas. We have the ships, the organization, the will, but we have not the business. If we could only clear away the barriers made by the rapids of the St. Lawrence and let those ships into the Great Lakes and the Mississippi Valley territory they would pick up more business than they could handle. The Shipping Board has property valued at three and one-half billions of dollars. Five per cent of this amount would more than pay the American part of the St. Lawrence improvement. The Shipping Board is losing millions every year. Turn the Great Lakes into a Mediterranean Sea and you will change the merchant marine of the United States from a losing proposition into a profitable business. What private business management would hesitate to spend 5 per cent of its investment to turn a fatal loss into a magnificent profit? The time is here, the necessity is crowding us to the wall. The landlocked continent lying between the Rockies and the Alleghenies, the bread basket and cream jug of the world, the land of the golden opportunities, rich in raw materials, lumber, coal, minerals, agriculture, and manufacturing products, must find a water highway to the ocean or we must surrender our enviable position as a world leader.

"We must have a way! Then, what is the way? The Congress put that question to the International Joint Commission three years ago this winter. After exhaustive study and investigation they have reached a conclusion.

"All the available routes were submitted to them—the all-Canadian and all-American—and after 40 hearings, conducted in all the large cities affected, they unanimously recommended the St. Lawrence route. This commission, composed of three eminent men of this country and three of Canada, have unanimously recommended the St. Lawrence route. They not only, without a dissenting vote, picked the St. Lawrence route as the best, but submitted detailed plans for its improvement. How simple are those plans. How easy of construction. The 182 miles of river from Montreal to Lake Ontario are divided by the commission into five divisions. The first division is from Montreal to Lake St. Louis, 25 miles, 13 miles of canal and 12 miles of river, with a change of elevation of 45 feet. In the canal section they make use of two locks and a guard lock. The second division is from Lake St. Louis to Lake St. Francis, 16 miles, with an elevation of 83 feet, 13½ miles of canal and 2½ miles of river. In this section they place two locks and one guard lock. The third section is from Lake St. Francis to St. Regis Island, a distance of 28 miles, all open sailing, with a change in elevation of 3 feet. The fourth division is from St. Regis Island to Chimney Point, a distance of 48 miles, 7½ miles of canal and 40½ miles of river. The elevation is 92 feet, and they use three locks in the canal. The fifth section is from Chimney Point to Lake Ontario, with wide river sailing the whole distance of 65 miles, with a change of elevation of only 1 foot. The power works are recommended to be placed in the fourth section, on the international boundary line, and provide for the development of a million and a half horsepower of hydroelectric current.

"This is the only way for the proponents of this improvement. Our friends are definitely committed to this route. Do not let the opposition distract us by drawing attention to the barge canal, all American, Hudson Bay, or any other fair tale of dreamland, easy way of avoiding the St. Lawrence, a waterway planned by a divine engineer in the morning of creation.

"The opponents tell us that we must not use the St. Lawrence because it flows through foreign territory. The same logic would compel the New Yorker to land his Manchester cargo at Liverpool rather than sail the Manchester ship canal because it goes through foreign territory.

"Oh, no; this hot-air logic and expensive propaganda, such as that staged on the congressional barge canal junket and the recent Washington congressional movies, will no longer affect the proponents of this necessary public improvement. If I understand aright, the people of the Middle West, South, and West are now fully awake to their interests. They realize that they are passing through a great transportation crisis and that the only hope of relief is in the adequate development of the waterways. The Great Lakes-St. Lawrence is not the only relief that must come. The Father of Waters, the Mississippi and its tributaries, the Ohio and Missouri, must be improved so that they can do their part in this transportation revival.

"I want to pause here to make a prophecy. It may not come in my day, but it will surely come. I shall put this in the Con-GRESSIONAL RECORD, so that future generations may see it. This city, the hindermost port of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway, will in time not only ship full cargoes without breaking bulk through the lakes and rivers to the east and the Atlantic, but in due time she will also ship full cargoes across your State to the west, and by way of the Mississippi, the Gulf, and the Panama Canal to the ports of the Orient and the coasts of South America. Some of you may think this is extravagant and beside the question. I feel that in due time it will come, and I want to record the thought.

"Now, with the way settled, we must examine into other matters: First, is this route feasible; can it be built? Second, will it be used when completed? Third, will it pay to go to all this trouble? I will not take much time to discuss these questions; the ground has been covered many times.

"The great engineers of this country and Canada have answered the first question in the affirmative. Col. Wooten and Mr. Bowden, after long study, definite surveys, and plans and specifications, have reported to both sections of the commission that the construction of this project is a simple engineering feat. I make the assertion that there is not a responsible engineer who will claim that there are any insurmountable difficulties in the way of the completion of a 30-foot channel from the Great Lakes to the Atlantic Ocean.

"I make this statement advisedly. I have read Gen. Goethals' recent St. Paul interview, in which he says that 'the proposed St. Lawrence-Great Lakes tidewater project is impracticable as a seaboard project.' He says 'it is visionary, because there is not enough water to carry ocean-going boats to the head of the Great Lakes. It would cost too much to deepen them, let alone improving the St. Lawrence.' George W. Goethals, consulting engineer New York-New Jersey Port and Harbor Development Commission, negatives the value of his opinion by going on to say that 'he has not read the report; he has not seen the plans; he knows nothing of the project.'

"Let me insert here the official depth of the five Great Lakes. Lake Erie has a mean depth of 85 feet, Lake Ontario 300 feet, Lake Huron 325 feet, Lake Michigan 300 feet, Lake Superior 600 feet. How much does the New York engineer think it will be necessary to deepen these lakes so that the ocean-going vessels may sail them without scraping on the bottom?

"Tell Gen. Goethals not to worry about the water. God will provide the water. You will remember that a long time ago another good and wise old man was worrying about a victim for the sacrifice. He had decided to stick the sacrificial knife into the body of his own son. God provided a ram when the time came for the sacrificial offering. The opponents of the seaway seem willing to sacrifice their kinsmen of the West on the altar of the money kings of the East so that a toll may be collected as their goods pass through the port of New York.

"The consulting engineer of the New York-New Jersey port and harbor commission says that it is 'all bosh to think that New York is opposed to the project for selfish reasons.' If the seaway is impractical, why should New York do so much worrying? We are not asking them for money, although I think they will be voluntarily coming across at about the time we are floating those international bonds. New York is not given to overlooking profitable investments.

"No, my friends, the conflicting statements that 'the St. Lawrence is impracticable' and that 'the St. Lawrence route would be detrimental to the interests of the New York Barge Canal, the commerce of New York State, and result in irreparable injury to the State of New York, its ports and business interests,' will not stand the test of any rules of logic I have ever seen. The seaway can be built. They know it, and that is what worries them. It will be used. With all its handicaps and obstructions, it is used now.

"The Detroit River to-day, connecting two land-bound inland lakes, carries more shipping than any other similar stretch of water in the world. The Suez Canal carries about 9,000,000 tons a year, the Panama about the same, and the Manchester Ship Canal about 3,000,000 tons, while—listen, my friends—the commerce passing through the Detroit River carries more tonnage than the combined traffic of all the important canals of the world—100,000,000 tons. No; our New York friends know that the way is feasible, and when built will be used. This is the logical conclusion deduced from an analytical examination of their altruistic anxiety that the builders of these works may lose their investment.

"Although the West, the Middle West, and the South have been paying their tribute to the port of New York for decades I am glad that a way will be found to finance this project without asking New York to contribute a dollar of tax toward its construction. I believe that the power, generated as a by-product, will more than carry all the expense of construction, operation, and depreciation.

"We are just in the morning of the electric day. The greatest progress in science and invention in this age will be made in the electric field. The New England States are interested in this project, particularly from possibilities from its hydroelectric development. The St. Lawrence drains one-third of the American continent north of the Mexican border, and in its course falls 220 feet and is capable of delivering five or six million continuous horsepower.

"On January 27, 1919, the Secretary of the Interior sent to Congress a supplemental estimate of an appropriation in the sum of $200,000 for a special investigation and report on the power supply for the Boston-Washington industrial region to be made during the fiscal year 1920.

"This resulted in an elaborate report—Professional Paper 123, issued recently by the Interior Department, W. S. Murray, chief engineer—recommending a superpower circuit including Boston, New York, and Washington and adjacent territory. A superpower zone along these same lines could be developed for the cities of Buffalo, Syracuse, Rochester, Toronto, Cleveland, Toledo, and Detroit.

"My own opinion is that a major superpower circuit can be created taking in all cities and towns within the following outer circle: Boston, New York, Baltimore, Washington, Pittsburgh, Cleveland, Toledo, Detroit, Buffalo, Toronto, and Montreal. In other words, including all territory in New England, New York, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan, and a part of the Dominion of Canada.

"It is time we were about our country's business. Too long have we idled and wasted. Let us start in earnest to recuperate the losses we have suffered as a result of inertia that followed the World War. Let us erect in this waterway a monument to American enterprise. When completed it will stand out as the greatest constructive policy of the age.

"This project is more than a mere business proposition. Its potential possibilities are limitless. It contains romance, comedy, tragedy, life, and death, not only to this generation but to countless generations yet unborn. Let us be pioneers and promoters of this the greatest and most beneficent enterprise of the age.

"As I look back over the years I ask myself why the big-visioned men of the past failed to utilize this wonderful natural resource. It means greater prosperity for the country—not for any select section but for all our people. The completion of this waterway is a program that interests us all. No matter what section of the country we come from we must work together in this one great cause. It is too big and too important a thing to permit sectional rivalries to overshadow our sense of justice and fairness. In the final analysis prosperity can come to America only when all the people are prosperous, and the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence River improvement will do much to bring about that desired end. There is no excuse for prejudice and no reason for jealousy.

"New York should not be jealous of any proposition that will add wealth and riches to the West and the South. We of the Middle West spend much of our money in New York City. If this proposition should add a half billion dollars annually to the States north, west, and south of her, New York would finally get most of the money.

"Remember I do not underestimate the power, financial strength, and finesse of our opponents. You will find that the New York interests will count heavily upon what may be called their 'patriotic appeal.' 'Do not spend money in foreign territory.' 'Why help the foreign port of Montreal at the expense of New York? We have plenty of demands for our money at home without sending it to a foreign country.' To offset that so-called patriotic appeal, I find that New York has built a canal forming a connection between the New York Barge Canal and Hudson River and the St. Lawrence River by way of Lake Champlain. It is right, proper, and patriotic for New York to build a canal into foreign territory but it is wrong, wicked, and high treason for the West to connect up the Great Lakes with the St. Lawrence.

"The time for talk is over. From now on we want votes. I call upon the men and women of this country to bring every influence to bear upon their Congressmen, to the end that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce shall report out House joint resolution 262 between now and the 15th of April. This matter must be settled during the Sixty-seventh Congress. It can be done, my fellow countrymen, if you will write a letter at once to your Congressman, asking him to facilitate the passage of this bill and thus enact it into law.

"Let us return to the proposition of lower freight rates. I make the statement that when the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway is completed with a 30-foot channel all the Great Lakes ports will be granted the same freight rates from Liverpool and other foreign ports as those in force from the same ports to New York City. Do you business men realize what that would do to your business? Do the farmers and manufacturers realize what it would do to them to have the cost of the railroad haul eliminated from Chicago, Milwaukee, Duluth, Detroit, Toledo, Cleveland, and Buffalo to New York City? It costs 22½ cents to ship a bushel of wheat from Chicago to New York by rail. Save it and give it to the farmers. It costs $40.65 to ship an automobile weighing 3,000 pounds from Toledo or Detroit to New York. Save it and divide it among those who make the automobiles. It affects equally all the territory between the Alleghenies and the Rockies. When this seaway is completed the freight rates will be revised radically downward.

"You ask me what proof I can submit to substantiate the above surprising statement. It is 160 miles farther from Liverpool to Cleveland by the St. Lawrence River than it is from Liverpool to New York. It is 275 miles farther to Toledo, 325 miles farther to Detroit, 860 miles farther to Chicago, and 950 miles farther to Superior and Duluth. What difference does even 1,000 miles make on a seaway? All the Atlantic seaports now, although some of them are a thousand miles apart, have the same Liverpool rate. Let me quote from the report of the International Joint Commission.

"The commission is inclined to agree with the statement that where there is a productive interior, ships will proceed as far inland as physically practicable, and that the farther inland they can penetrate the greater will be the resulting economy and the more extensive the area benefited. Notable examples of rivers on which considerable traffic has been developed by ocean-going ships are the Amazon, the Yangtze-Kiang, the Rhine, the Danube, the Columbia, the Willamette, the Delaware, the lower Mississippi, and the St. Lawrence itself. It appears in evidence that the same rate of freight was paid from New York to Bombay as from New York to Calcutta, although the latter port was 2,000 miles farther and involved 90 miles of a tortuous river channel much more difficult than the St. Lawrence. It may also be noted that ocean shipping has to an increasing extent made Montreal its destination, although railways extend down both banks of the St. Lawrence from Montreal to Quebec.

"Two thousand miles farther and a tortuous channel of 90 miles make no difference in the rates. The total restricted channel of our seaway, including both the St. Lawrence and Welland Canal, is only 59 miles. The equal rates from the lake ports are not visionary but are a corollary of the present practice.

"This may not be the birth of a nation, but it will prosper our homeland; it will become the business salvation of the land we love. We are on the last lap now; let us pull hard and make the dream of Father La Salle, visioned nearly three centuries ago, come true in our day, enacted into law by the Sixty-seventh Congress in the year of our Lord 1922.

"In opening this address I paid tribute to this great city, and now in closing I want to congratulate the city of Chicago on the efficiency of her publicity agents. Her newspapers equal the best in the world. I congratulate her on the alertness and vision of her newspaper men. This organization is a beacon light of progress. In closing I am using the subject of the last paragraph of 'The Cream Jug of America,' by my friend Addison C. Thomas.

"For the Mississippi Valley and the Great Lakes territory to build its deep waterway to the sea by Lake Erie and to the gulf by New Orleans, millions will reap the benefit. From the Alleghenies to the Rocky Mountains every home, every hamlet, every farm, every factory, all the living, all the unborn must reap the measures of reward. Why? Because the Mississippi Valley and the Great Lakes territory will then be the loading station for the world."

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for 20 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, permit me to call the attention of the House to an article appearing in the March number of the Cosmopolitan magazine purporting to be written by one William G. Shepherd under the caption, "Why America isn't dry." It has been my policy to ignore misrepresentations in regard to my attitude and my part in securing the passage of prohibition legislation, but in this instance the falsehood is so flagrant and the sinister purpose so plain that I may be permitted to enter an emphatic denial. I should have ignored this if the article had not purported to give these false statements under quotation marks with the claim that they were made by me personally. The statements ascribed to me are nothing but a tissue of falsehood from start to finish, and not a syllable of the purported interview was ever authorized.

I might content myself with this denial, but I know that those who are engaged in the wet propaganda, of which this article is a part, will not hesitate at any means that they believe will further their end. A denial is just what they want, as it gives them an excuse for amplifying and reiterating their charges, and to demand a retraction only serves a like purpose. It is foolish to expect that men who are willing to lend themselves to such disreputable methods have any conscientious scruples against piling one falsehood on top of another. They have no consideration for a person's good name or reputation. The game they play is for the purpose of discrediting prohibition, and they are not limited by what they consider old foggy notions about honesty. Fortunately in this case the most fertile imagination can not suggest any reason based on facts why I should misrepresent my connection with the prohibition legislation so as to make myself an object of ridicule and contempt. Still that is clearly what this fake interview says I did.

The one redeeming feature about the story is that it is such an ignorant and clumsy fabrication that anyone who knows the facts can not be misled by it. It is plainly a labored effort on the part of the writer to convey the impression that I never was interested either in the passage of the war time or the national prohibition act, familiarly known as the Volstead Act; that I did what was done only because I had to do it, being that I was chairman of the Judiciary Committee; that the act is so defective that it is quite useless, and that I am now trying to deny my connection with this legislation, trying to shift my responsibility for what I did to the Judiciary Committee, and that in effect I am apologizing and pandering to the wets. This despicable and cowardly attack is evidently a part of the campaign of vilification which is being directed against me. Immediately after the wet Fourth of July demonstration in New York City last summer proved such a fiasco the leader of that strenuous effort gave to the press a statement, then generally published, that the wets were willing to spend a million dollars to defeat me in the next election. Vilification and threats will not change my views or affect my purpose in the least. I am not shirking any responsibility nor apologizing for anything I have done to make prohibition of the liquor traffic effective, and I have never done either. I believe in the law and the policy it is designed to enforce. I have always been in favor of prohibition—county, State, and National—and despite all wet propaganda to the contrary, I believe that the prohibition law has done more good than any other law that we have passed.

Let me point out to you some of the statements that this article says I made. In speaking of the prohibition bill, I refer to the bill that became Title II of the Volstead Act, as that title embraces the essential features of the act. Title I was drawn to enforce war-time prohibition, and my share in drafting and passing that is immaterial at this time, as it is no longer in force. Title III only applies to industrial alcohol for use in the arts. In this fake interview I am represented as saying that I did not write the prohibition bill; that it was not only the duty of the Judiciary Committee to create an act to enforce the prohibition amendment but that the Judiciary Committee actually wrote the bill, and that all the members of the committee participated in writing it; and I am further quoted as saying that when we—the committee—saw that a law had to be framed for the enforcement of the new amendment, we sent out everywhere over the United States to get together all the plans we could find for prohibition laws—county laws, State laws, and drafts of national laws. Neither of these statements have in them the slightest foundation. They are brazen falsehoods.

I am making this statement here in the presence of you who know the facts. Nearly all the members of the Judiciary Committee who reported the prohibition bill are here and can contradict me if I misrepresent what took place. For several weeks I devoted such time as I could spare from my other work to the drafting of this bill, though it was no more my duty than it was the duty of any Member of this House to draft it. The committee made no arrangement to secure any laws or plans for a prohibition law. In drafting the bill I made use of whatever bills had been introduced on the subject and consulted in the Supreme Court library State statutes and court decisions. No other member of the committee or of this House was consulted or participated with me in drafting it, and so far as I am aware no Member of the House knew that I intended to introduce such a bill until it was introduced. Very soon after its introduction hearings were had in the customary way, in which those against as well as those in favor of the bill were given an opportunity to present their views. These hearings were public, and a full stenographic report was made and printed of what every person said. Following these hearings the bill was carefully read and reread for amendments by the committee, and a number of amendments were made, but these did not greatly change the bill from the form in which it was first introduced, as will appear by comparing the bill with the present law. Several of the amendments were offered by me as a result of the hearings and the discussion of the legislation. The record of the Judiciary Committee shows just what was done at each of its meetings and is conclusive proof that the committee did not write the bill, and the record of this House will show that the original bill with my name as the author was introduced by me before the Judiciary Committee considered the matter at all.

Here is another rank falsehood. I am said to have been asked this question: "Why do they call the act the Volstead Act; you say you did not write it at all?" And this is what I am said to have answered: "Well, it is the custom in Congress to name a bill after the chairman of the committee which proposes the bill; that is how the bill got my name." The man who made that statement was too ignorant to manufacture a successful fake. This class of bills do not bear the name of the chairman of the committee that reports it simply because he is chairman. If this bill had been introduced by any other Member of this House, he need not even have been a member of the Judiciary Committee, it would have borne his name. Though I drew the so-called antibeer bill, it does not bear my name, regardless of the fact that it was reported by me while chairman of the Judiciary Committee and that I had charge of its passage in the House. The so-called antibeer bill was part of a bill drafted and introduced by me, but which was afterwards reintroduced by another Member, and because it was so reintroduced it would bear his name and not mine. The class of bills that usually bear the name of the chairman are tariff bills, and the reason for that is that such bills are usually prepared by subcommittees of the Ways and Means Committee and are not introduced in the House until they are about ready to be reported.

I might go on and point out a number of other instances in which the writer of this article shows that he was too ignorant to manufacture a successful fake story. For instance, he makes me say that the war prohibition act was passed before the end of the war, while everyone in the House knows that it was passed after the war ended; and speaking of the bill reported by the Judiciary Committee to enforce that act he made me say that report was made before the prohibition amendment had been ratified. It was not reported until after such ratification. He says I told him I was made chairman of the Judiciary Committee a year before I drafted this bill. I was made chairman the same year and had only held the position a few weeks when I introduced it. To make my position as chairman accidental he says I told him it was my turn under the rules to be chairman when I was appointed. While this is not very material, I may be pardoned for saying that there is no such rule. When I was first placed on the Judiciary Committee I was made the highest ranking Republican on it. There was no rule or custom that gave me that rank. I could not have complained if I had been refused a place on the committee altogether, and when thereafter the House became Republican those who selected the chairman were at liberty to disregard the custom of making the highest ranking Republican in the previous Congress chairman, a thing they have done in a number of instances. While these misstatements are in themselves of no consequence, they tend to show that they could not have been made by one familiar with the facts, and besides there can be no possible reason why I should have made them.

I am amused at the attempt of the writer of this article to have me say that the prohibition law is full of all sorts of "holes," as he expresses it. He does not hesitate to give it as his own opinion that it is full of "leak holes." All the adjectives in the dictionaries have been used to denounce this law as too drastic and all-embracing. Hundreds of thousands of dollars have been spent in court and counsel fees to find some of these leak holes, but up to date that money has been spent to little purpose. If the writer of this article had taken pains to compare the national law with the most recent and effective State prohibition laws, it might have eased his troubled soul. The national law simply applies to national conditions the ordinary and most effective provisions of State laws. If the national act is without any merit, it is strange that the friends of prohibition are copying the law and applying it to their States. While no human law is perfect, the national prohibition act is altogether too perfect to suit the wets. If it is true that the act has a lot of leak holes, why did not this expert on the subject point out some of them? To simply make the assertion gets a person nowhere. When he cites the importation of Scotch whisky in New York as an instance, he only makes an exhibit of his own ignorance. The first part of his story is disproved by the last part of it, as he admits that the Treasury Department stopped such importation. That could not have happened without authority in the law to do so. The law on that subject is perfectly plain.

The suggestion that the law is defective because the regulations are not written into the law, coming from one who is apparently unable to distinguish between law and law enforcement, will make no great hit. Evidently he does not know what a regulation is for. Regulations simply govern the officers in the administration of the law and are necessary in the administration of this law the same as they are in the administration of other laws.

I am not surprised that he condemns the reorganization of the prohibition unit. So far as I am aware, and I think I know the sentiment of those who have given any thought to the subject, everyone who favored enforcement condemned the old system, which he praises.

The other complaint against the law is that the enforcement officers are political appointees. To prove this a grievous wrong he makes an attack on these officers that is so coarse and brutal that it destroys itself. This demand for their appointment under civil service, a demand that is supported by some of the most enthusiastic wets, naturally appeals to those who do not know to what extent politics play a part in civil-service appointments. I am not willing to place those who are charged with enforcement in a position where they can blame any failure to lack of power to select and discharge their employees. Theoretically such employees may be discharged for inefficiency, but the practical effect of a civil-service appointment is to give a life tenure, so much so that Congress was compelled to pass a civil-service pension to get superannuated employees out of office. I believe that the administration should make the appointments and be held responsible for results. Appointments under civil service could be made to absolutely destroy enforcement. While it is true that some of the enforcement officers have failed to do their duty, the great majority of them have been and are faithful and are doing very good work.

The attempt to discredit the prohibition act as a "patched-up" law that only received perfunctory attention in its preparation is so thoroughly disproved by the records of this House and of the Judiciary Committees of the House and Senate that it took more than the ordinary nerve to make the claim. If any law ever received careful consideration, this one did. Not only is the law itself based upon the experience of the prohibition States but nearly every sentence in it was fought over by friend and foe.

Having sponsored this law and the prohibition cause in the House, much bitterness and abuse has been directed against me personally, and as a consequence my name has in a measure become synonymous with the prohibition policy. For this reason, if for no other, I feel that I owe it to the friends of that cause to denounce this fabrication, which is clearly aimed at the prohibition policy rather than against me personally. But there is also another reason, one that is more personal. No one here can doubt my attitude on the prohibition question. You are all aware of the work I have done in trying to place upon the statute books an effective enforcement law. If you could be persuaded that I had made such statements as the article ascribes to me; if I am disowning the work I have done and I am apologizing and pandering to the wets, I would deserve nothing but your pity and contempt. I value your good opinion too highly to permit that.

As I do not control newspapers and have no effective means of reaching the public save through the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I trust that the House will pardon me for making this statement. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota yields back three minutes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, on yesterday we celebrated the birthday of the greatest American. To-day we have listened to a discussion of the geography of Andrew Jackson's birthplace, and we listened just a few moments ago to an address by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD], who, evidently aroused by the remarks concerning the doubt as to the place of Andrew Jackson's birth, has hastened to inform future generations all about the paternity of the legislative child that bears his name. He acknowledges himself to be its proud father. I am glad to hear the gentleman from Minnesota make an open, free confession on that point.

He who steals my purse steals trash,
But he who steals my legislative glory
Steals that which does not enrich him,
But makes me poor indeed.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, last August I was bold enough in this House to present some remarks with reference to the relations of the United States Government to that of the Republic of Mexico, and if the House will indulge me for a little while I want very briefly to point out what I believe the relationship between the two Governments should be at the present time.

It is well known to all gentlemen in the House, and in the country as well, that in 1910 the régime of Porfirio Diaz, the President of the southern Republic, was disturbed by a revolution, under the leadership of Madero. You will remember that Diaz for a long period of years held practically undisputed sway throughout Mexico.

His policies, however, had during the course of his rule engendered a great deal of opposition among the people of Mexico, who believed that Diaz was too generous with foreigners in the grant of concessions and in the treatment of foreign capital and was not considerate enough of the rights of the people of Mexico. We all know how turbulent has been the history of Mexico since 1910. We know how unsatisfactory have been the relations between the United States and Mexico, both under Madero and under all the provisional governments which followed the various revolutions, and especially under the administration of Mr. Carranza, which was brought to an end in 1920 by the last revolution, which finally resulted in the election of the present President of the United States of Mexico.

Gentlemen, permit me to say that in what I desire to suggest to-day I am not concerned with individuals; I am not concerned as to who may be President of Mexico or as to who may be Secretary of State or President of the United States, so far as those relations are concerned; but I come from a State that is more or less familiar with Mexican conditions. I have for a long number of years watched the development of the Mexican situation. Membership on the Committee on Foreign Affairs has kindled that interest, because I believe that wrapped up in the relations between the United States and Mexico and with other South and Central American Republics are questions that may affect American relations not only with them but with other nations of the world. We remember that during the World War it was repeatedly charged that there was within Mexico a certain element affiliated with German influences and German interests, and for years we heard the charge made that Japan had a sinister purpose in conducting negotiations with Mexico looking to the acquisition of a naval harbor and naval base on the Pacific coast. The whole question of the Monroe doctrine not only involves us and our relations with South and Central American countries, but its maintenance involves potential controversies with other nations who have interests in Mexico and property rights there; and so I say, gentlemen, that these considerations particularly suggest to the United States the importance of conducting our affairs with Mexico in a broad and considerate fashion.

The present administration of Mexico has not been recognized officially by the Government of the United States, notwithstanding it has been functioning for something like a year and a half. The Carranza régime was overturned in May, 1920. An election was held, and on the 1st of December the present administration of Mexico assumed office, and since that time, in greater measure than ever before during the 10 years of revolution since Diaz, order and stability have been preserved within the Republic to the south of us.

Why is it that the United States Government has not recognized the at least de facto government of Mexico? I beg to refer to the last public statement from the Department of State. On the 7th day of June, 1921, the department issued a statement which in part reads as follows:

The fundamental question which confronts the Government of the United States in considering its relations with Mexico is the safeguarding of property rights against confiscation. Mexico is free to adopt any policy which she pleases with respect to her public lands, but she is not free to destroy without compensation valid titles which have been obtained by American citizens under Mexican law.

Then omitting, I come to this statement:

If these provisions—

After referring to the Mexican constitution of 1917—

If these provisions are to be put into effect retroactively, the properties of American citizens will be confiscated on a great scale.

Then omitting—

Accordingly this Government has proposed a treaty of amity and commerce with Mexico in which Mexico will agree to safeguard the rights of property which attached before the constitution of 1917 was promulgated.

After the issuance of that statement, in which it was laid down that the condition upon which the United States would grant recognition was the execution by the Government of Mexico of a treaty specifically, or at least by implication, promising a construction of a certain clause in the constitution of Mexico, the Mexican Government indicated its refusal to execute such an obligation as the price of recognition. To anyone who is familiar at all with the Mexican character it is perfectly apparent that that action was prompted by the knowledge that if the Mexican authorities should, at the demand of a foreign power, agree to modify or amend their constitution for the control of their domestic affairs, it would arouse such opposition among the people of Mexico as to endanger the existence of that Government, or, if not to endanger it, to seriously impair its strength. Of course, the Republic of Mexico refused, at the demand of a foreign power, to make any promise regarding its fundamental law. Any administration in Mexico which, at the demand of a foreign Government should by treaty agree to abrogate or modify its constitution, would be overthrown by an enraged people.

But I want to call the attention of the Members of this House and of the country to the fact that nowhere in this statement issued by the Department of State is any claim advanced that life is not protected in Mexico. If American life is not protected in Mexico, the State Department makes no mention whatever of it in this statement. It bases the whole question of recognition on "the fundamental question which confronts the Government of the United States in considering its relations with Mexico," and that is the safeguarding of property rights. Gentlemen, what does that mean? It means that article 27 of the Mexican constitution of 1917 is the point at issue. What is that constitution? I can not undertake to read all of article 27, but let me read what the Government of Mexico has to say with reference to it.

On June 26, 1921, President Obregon sent a telegram to the New York World with reference to this matter. What did he say as to what the policy of the Republic of Mexico and its Government will be? Listen to his own words:

Foreign capital will be invited and given every justice. Every private right acquired prior to May 1, 1917, when the new constitution was adopted, will be accepted and fully protected. The famous article 27, one section of which declares the national ownership of subsoil rights in petroleum, will never be given retroactive effect, nor has it ever been given retroactive effect.

Gentlemen of the House, the refusal of the American Government to recognize the Government of Mexico is based solely on the hypothesis that article 27 will be construed retroactively and, if so, that confiscation will result, and, therefore, that the American Government will not recognize the Republic of Mexico until a treaty is executed saying that no such construction shall be placed on that article. But in the face of this position we have the solemn statement of the President of Mexico that it never has operated retroactively, nor will the Government of Mexico ever undertake to put it into effect retroactively. In addition the President of Mexico has made that statement not once, but repeatedly. In the correspondence between the Republic of Mexico and the United States in 1920, on November 26, the Mexican Government in a note to Secretary of State Colby said:

Not one square yard of land has been confiscated in Mexico. Not a single legitimate right of property has been annulled, nor do we intend to deviate from this fundamental policy.

President de la Huerta and President-elect Obregon have also made repeated public declarations to the effect that article 27 of the Mexican Federal constitution is not and must not be interpreted as retroactive or violative of valid property rights.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LONDON. What is the gentleman's theory as to the right of a people to correct mistakes made by past legislatures? Have not the Mexican people a right, when they realize that too large concessions have been granted to private capital, whether their own or foreign capital, to withdraw those concessions? Has not every people that sovereign right?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I can not agree with the gentleman as to that. I can not go that far. My theory is that any property right or concession granted by a de facto government or a government that is exercising the functions of government, that is maintaining itself, would naturally vest rights in the grantee in the absence of fraud, which, of course, vitiates everything. Abstractly a Government might possibly possess such a power, but its exercise could rarely be justified.

Mr. LONDON. The gentleman realizes that in the Constitution of the United States our National Government is not prohibited from passing legislation impairing the obligation of contracts.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I will say to the gentleman that whatever conclusion at which we might arrive after discussing that matter, the question does not arise here, because everybody admits that the Republic of Mexico, like the Republic of the United States, so far as future transactions are concerned, has the right to put into its Constitution the provision contained in the Mexican constitution. The State Department acknowledges that. So that the only question raised here is what has already transpired, and in the state of this record with the statement of Mexico that its constitution does not operate retroactively there can be no plausible ground on which this Government may longer refuse to recognize the Republic of Mexico.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. May I interrupt the gentleman a minute?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, which seems to be more pertinent than the one propounded by the gentleman from New York. The gentleman has stated that the President of Mexico has given certain assurances to this Government, but nevertheless this Government refuses to recognize Mexico. Now, what is it that this Government demands of the Mexican Government as a condition for recognition?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I will answer the gentleman by saying that the State Department in its last official statement demanded as the price for recognition that the Mexican Government execute a treaty in which it shall be particularly specified in effect that Mexico shall place a certain construction on its constitution of 1917.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Does the gentleman find any objection to the State Department requesting or demanding anything; is there anything fundamentally wrong about it?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Certainly there is something fundamentally wrong about it. There is nothing fundamentally wrong about it so far as it affects the power of the United States—the United States can refuse to recognize Mexico, but there is something fundamentally wrong in such an attitude, if the gentleman wants to cultivate cordial relations with other nations, if he desires to cultivate such relations with Mexico as will contribute to that Government's interest and desire to protect American lives; and there is something wrong in such an attitude if we would treat the people of Mexico on the same terms as we treat other nations. If so, we should not require her to execute a treaty that may be humiliating to her national pride and sovereignty. I will say to the gentleman that, in my view, the proper course would be to recognize her as an existing government because she is an existing government, and then if the Government of Mexico does not perform its duty to American citizens and American property, if the President of the Republic of Mexico does not keep the pledge made in his solemn statement, then let the Government of the United States hold that Government responsible; but do not undertake to humiliate it by saying "the price of recognition is to come out here before the whole world and sign on the dotted line."

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. Would not the situation be like this: If the gentleman's own State of California, for instance, should pass a law dealing with some phase of the Japanese question in relation to citizens within its border and Japan should undertake to ask the United States to enter into a treaty, as to how the Supreme Court of the United States would interpret that particular constitutional provision of California?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I thank my colleague for the suggestion.

Mr. LINEBERGER. That is an entirely different proposition. Here we are dealing between two sovereign nations. This is a national law; the constitution is a national document.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I will say to the gentleman from California that we ought to assume that another Government will live up to its obligations. We ought not to assume, as the State Department has, that this particular constitution of Mexico will be treated retroactively. There is nothing in it to indicate that it is to operate retroactively. Our State Department admits that Mexico is within her rights so far as future rights are concerned.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Our State Department tries to obviate any question of a different interpretation from the one given by the President of Mexico. They want to get the language on record in the form of a treaty, and I see nothing humiliating to the sovereign power of Mexico in embodying such an agreement in a treaty.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Suppose Mexico does not execute the treaty; what would you do? Continue the present uncertain condition, withdraw our consuls, and have no diplomatic connection with Mexico, and invite riots and uprisings and revolution?

Mr. LINEBERGER. We would continue to do as we have done in the past. Let things continue until Mexico is ready to negotiate a treaty and solve the question as it should be solved.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Will the gentleman allow me to make this suggestion?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. That the great problem with Mexico at this time in connection with its people and the Government of the United States is that the United States is imposing a condition which anybody who knows the Mexican characteristics, or the characteristics of any people on this earth, knows would destroy the hold of the Government on the Mexican people.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I thank the gentleman. I have already made the suggestion that the moment the Government of Mexico pledged a foreign power to alter, amend, or agree to a particular construction of the constitution, the demagogues and revolutionaries all over Mexico would rise up and declare that the President had sold out to the foreigners, that he had surrendered Mexican pride and sovereignty, and that he would be driven from power.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman, I understood, stated a moment ago that he thought we ought to recognize the Republic of Mexico, and then if the Republic of Mexico did not do what we thought it ought to do, we should hold it responsible. How could we hold it responsible?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. We could hold her responsible much more surely than we do now.

Mr. MANN. What possible method is there by which one country can hold another country responsible unless you go to war?

Mr. NORTON. By treaty.

Mr. MANN. Oh, you can not hold anybody responsible by treaty.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Suppose you execute a treaty and then Mexico breaks it, what are you going to do?

Mr. MANN. Then we might go to war; I do not know.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman proposes instead of having an arrangement in advance that we should recognize Mexico and then hold her responsible. I ask for information by what method the United States can hold the Government of Mexico responsible except by the method it is now pursuing, of refusing to recognize the Government?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for me to make a suggestion?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I would like to make this suggestion: The price that this country is asking of Mexico would destroy the Mexican Government which we do recognize.

Mr. MANN. Of course, nobody really believes that, I suppose.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. But I know it.

Mr. MANN. I do not believe that.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I shall have to proceed, without interruption, as I have only five minutes left. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks me the question, "What are we going to do if we do recognize Mexico and she does not recognize American rights?" My answer to the gentleman is, What are you going to do if you do not recognize Mexico and she does not recognize American rights? I will tell you what you are going to do. The whole question involved here is whether the United States wants to help Mexico really create and maintain a stable government. I want American rights protected in Mexico, I want American life protected in Mexico, and I know that the only way those things can be protected is by some government in Mexico which is able and willing to protect them. I want to help the present government of Mexico to maintain itself, to suppress rebellion, to punish outrage, to put down uprising, but if you fail to recognize a government in Mexico no government can last for a great while.

What do you want? Do you want to return to the days of Villa? Do you want American rights and American lives imperiled by the ravages of Villa? Do you want to invite another Zapata, with his marauding bands, to harry the lands of Mexico and destroy the lives of Americans and American property? Do you want another Palaez to draw a line with a sword about some little territory and within it levy tribute on American oil and financial interests? Do you want 50 little warring bands in Mexico, or do you want one stable government with which the United States can deal and with which the United States can carry on negotiations, to which the United States may look for protection of its nationals, or do you want a host of irresponsible chieftains?

I do know this, that from 1910 until 1920 the papers of the country were filled with accounts of American lives that were lost, of American women who were violated, of American property that was destroyed; but since 1920, since the Government of Mexico has begun to function, the State Department has not made any claim that American lives are not respected and protected. I do know that the only complaint that is now made is that it is feared that article 27 will be so construed that the titles of some American oil interests in Mexico may be imperiled. I do know that the newspapers a day or two ago carried an account that recognition is dependent on adjustment of the foreign debt and the oil tax. An Associated Press dispatch from Mexico City stated that it was expected soon to clear Mexico's finances and have an adjustment of the foreign debt and the Mexican oil tax. Only two questions now remain between the United States and Mexico, and they are, first, the foreign debt, which the American Government wants paid and which of course ought to be paid, and which Mexico says it is going to pay; the other controversy is the oil tax. Those are the two questions. Obregon, the President of Mexico, wants to pay the foreign debt, but he wants to use the oil taxes with which to pay it. The men who hold the Mexican bonds want those bonds paid, but they do not want them paid with oil taxes. It is all right for the United States to levy a tariff duty on Mexican oil, it is all right for the United States to tax the natural resources of Mexico when they reach our borders, but interests in the United States, influential interests, want the United States Government to interpose and prevent the Mexican Government from levying a tax upon oil.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Influential interests in this country want the United States to refuse to recognize Mexico until she promises that she will not levy a tax on the oil that is taken from her own soil, the natural resources of the Republic. I do not want oil confiscated. I want all American rights protected, wherever they may be, but I do not want to imperil the rights of all Americans in Mexico; I do not want to imperil the property of every American in Mexico simply to appease the desires of a few oil interests in Mexico, who ought to contribute a reasonable amount of taxes toward the support of that Government.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I can not yield now. The time has come for the United States to become concerned in respect to the relations between the United States and Mexico. To-day the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHREVE] called attention to the fact that in the pending bill a large appropriation is being carried to foster trade with South and Central American countries. You can do more to forward American trade and intercourse in Mexico by pursuing toward her a large and exalted international policy than you can by trying to bulldoze her under threats that if she does not comply with American demands recognition will not be granted. All South and Central American countries are looking with interest upon our treatment of Mexico. If we want to foster there a spirit of cooperation with the United States, if we want to dissipate any feeling that the United States is always standing above those little countries with a dollar mark written all over her, we ought to be generous enough to give them a chance to work out their own destiny.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The only manner in which these countries can work out their own problems is for the United States to give them a chance to pursue for themselves their own destiny. I do not want to go into Mexico as we went into San Domingo. I do not want to go into Mexico, as we are now in Haiti and San Domingo, sword in hand. I do not want to have to go into Mexico like we went into Cuba a few years ago with an army. But the only way we are going to be kept out of Mexico with an army is for the United States to give Mexico a chance to work out her own salvation, and when a de facto government arises in Mexico, one able to protect life and property, one prepared to function as a government, a government that says that American property shall be safe, a government that says that her constitution shall not be construed retroactively, our Government ought to grant it a chance to work out its own destiny and its own future. We must not forget that we celebrated Washington's birthday on yesterday. We must not forget that the influence of that great American, the spirit that led him in achieving our own liberties, found a fruitful resting place in South and Central America. That it was the example of Washington that inspired the great Bolivar to lead his people into their independence and sovereignty. The time has come when the United States should no longer deny recognition. The time has come to act. The United States should not by inaction permit Mexico to drift, drift into turmoil and revolution that will threaten American lives and the property of our people. Yea, even the peace of the continent. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KETCHAM].

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, in common with all the other members of the committee, I am greatly interested in the measure now before us making appropriations for the Departments of Commerce and Labor. The splendid form in which all the previous appropriation bills have been presented for our consideration promises prompt and, I trust, favorable action upon this particular one. It is not my purpose, however, to take the time of the committee to discuss any of the features of this bill but rather to present some facts which I have gathered bearing on a closely related subject, namely, where and how the revenue may be obtained to meet the appropriations provided in this and the other great supply bills now being presented to the House.

Mr. Chairman, much discussion is now taking place on the subject of the sales tax, in various forms, as a means of providing the increase of revenue required to pay the soldiers' adjusted compensation. A great deal of propaganda has been circulated by those who believe that such a tax is the easiest and simplest kind of a tax to levy and collect, and that it is also the fairest tax to impose. On the other hand, the great body of consumers and producers of the country are bitterly opposed to a sales tax, because they feel that it is based upon consumption rather than upon ability to pay, which they regard as the correct basis upon which to levy taxes. The attitude of this great body of our people is aptly phrased in the saying, "From each according to his ability, to each according to his need." They feel that the proponents of the sales tax are reversing the sentiment thus aptly expressed so that it reads, "From each according to his need, to each according to his ability." I am opposed to any form of sales tax as a means of raising revenue. Making exemptions in favor of certain classes of our people or in favor of certain commodities widely used, in order to establish the principle of the sales tax, is particularly objectionable. I can account for the active support given the sales tax in no other way than the desire for some form of taxation that will afford an opportunity to be relieved of the burdens imposed by the present income and surtax law, which evidently is working altogether too well to suit certain classes of our taxpayers.

It has become an axiom in the discussion of tax revision on the floor of the House that "taxes should be lifted, not shifted." This position has been taken by leaders in the discussion on both sides of the Chamber. It is fair to all classes of our people to provide a proportionate share of relief from the tax burden when any reductions are made. I have prepared a brief study which establishes clearly to my mind the fact that the adoption of a sales tax will perceptibly shift the burden of taxation from those who now bear it. In order to make this study clear to the committee I have made use of the plan adopted by the Bureau of the Census in establishing the center of population of the United States. To insure accuracy, the various centers referred to in the discussion were located by the Bureau of Standards, with the exception of the center of population, which was taken from the Bureau of the Census. On this outline map of the United States has been located, first, the geographic center of the United States in north central Kansas, near the Nebraska line.

Mr. O'CONNOR. At what point?

Mr. KETCHAM. North central Kansas. To be exact, in Smith County, near the Nebraska line.

Second, the center of population, census of 1920, in southwest Indiana.

Third, center of manufacturing industries, total value of output, 1919, in northwest central Ohio.

Fourth, center of live stock, farm crops, and forest products, census of 1920, in east central Missouri.

Fifth, center of personal and corporation taxes, 1918 statistics of income, in northeast Ohio.

Sixth, center of surtaxes, 1918 statistics of income, on the State line between Ohio and Pennsylvania near the corners of Ashtabula, Trumbull, Mercer, and Crawford Counties.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to have the committee fix its attention, first, upon center No. 5, that of personal and corporation income taxes. This may be fairly regarded as the center of taxpaying ability as determined by the operation of our revenue law. It is not seriously disputed by the advocates of the sales tax that the center of such tax, established in the same manner as the centers indicated in this study, would follow the center of population and the center of production. Both of these being west of the center of taxation referred to above, would inevitably shift the burden of taxation from the East toward the West. In this connection it will be of some interest to the committee, I am sure, to be advised that 67½ per cent of the surtax payers whose incomes are above $70,000 reside east of the Allegheny Mountains. In order that the committee may see the location of these upper surtax payers by States I present herewith the following table showing such taxpayers for the years 1918 and 1919:

It will be recalled that it was in the interest of the particular group of taxpayers indicated in the table above that the attempt was made during the passage of the present revenue law to "shift" the burden of taxation by reducing the maximum rate of surtaxes from 65 per cent to 32 per cent on incomes above $68,000. This group numbered 10,437 in 1919, as against 647,312 surtax payers whose incomes range from $5,000 to $68,000, who were given no reduction in the measure as drawn. Fortunately, the bill was so amended as to raise the maximum surtax rate to 50 per cent from the 32 per cent proposed and at the same time give a reduction to the great body of surtax payers having incomes from $5,000 to $68,000 per year. The surtax load was thereby measurably lifted for all instead of being shifted from one group to another.

Mr. Chairman, it seems clear to me that the enactment of a sales tax, as proposed, would establish a principle of taxation wholly at variance with the generally accepted standard of ability to pay. Organized groups of consumers and producers are a unit in opposition to it, and one can not escape the conclusion that it is one of the shifting schemes so strongly urged by interested groups. The centers of population, of farm, and of factory production all lie to the west of the center of wealth, as already shown. The imposition of a sales tax would unquestionably shift the center of taxation in the same direction.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I understood my colleague to give the center of manufacture and the center of production. What difference is there between the center of manufacture and the center of production? What is the difference between these two centers?

Mr. KETCHAM. The center of manufacturing is in north-west central Ohio while the center of agricultural production is in eastern Missouri.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHREVE. I yield one-half minute more to the gentleman.

Mr. BURTNESS. I wondered if the gentleman could point out on the map where the center of consumption is located?

Mr. KETCHAM. I hope to have some data—

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHREVE. I yield one minute more to the gentleman.

Mr. KETCHAM. I would say in response to the question of the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURTNESS] that I hope to have in the near future some figures in four or five typical commodities of consumption and shall be glad to work them out as suggested.

Mr. LINEBERGER. I would like to have the gentleman make a distinction between luxuries and necessities.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman should put in his speech his definition of luxuries and his definition of necessities. It would be interesting to all of us.

Mr. KETCHAM. In conclusion may I say that the idea of presenting this brief study has not been that of advancing any pet notion of my own, but has been undertaken with the hope of reaching a decision on the question of taxation that could be backed up by figures which are official and final. [Applause.]

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON].

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I want to follow up the argument of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] on the subject of recognition of Mexico, although when I originally asked for time I intended to speak on another subject. Our Constitution provides that no State shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts.

This is a prohibition upon the State legislatures, but not upon the National Government. The National Government is free to impair the obligation of contracts should the welfare of the Nation demand it. In any event, the supreme right of the people has not been surrendered.

I recall that Jefferson advocated that no constitution should last for more than 20 years. His reasoning was that no generation should undertake to bind any future generation, and that while the age of an average generation was one-third of a century the political age of a generation, according to Jefferson, was not more than 20 years; he believed that the Constitution should expire automatically so as to guard against the innate conservatism and inertia of the mass.

For the same reason he insisted that the life of treaties should be very brief.

The difficulty with the argument of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] is that he is afraid to follow his own reasoning to its logical conclusion. He is right in protesting against the Government of the United States failing to treat the Republic of Mexico as a friend. He is right in his condemnation of the present attitude of the State Department which subjects this country to the charge that it intends to dominate over the entire American Continent instead of being the friend and the guide and the leader of the South American Republics.

The real objection to the position of our State Department toward the Government of Mexico is the demand that the Republic of Mexico should surrender its right to change its own constitution. The Mexican constitution stipulates that no retroactive legislation shall be passed affecting the rights of foreign property. Our State Department demands that by treaty or by an agreement with us as an outside power the Mexican people should covenant not to change their constitution in that regard, and that the Mexican people to that extent should surrender their sovereignty.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Suppose a foreign nation should require the United States to change its Constitution as the price of recognition. What would be the answer of the gentleman on that subject?

Mr. LONDON. I know. But the fault of the argument of the gentleman from Texas is that he lays too much stress upon the pride of a people. It is not merely pride; it is their very existence that is involved. Take for illustration this matter of national prohibition. I voted against it because I believed that the national prohibition amendment had no place in the Constitution. Constitutions are written to secure the rights of individuals against society, and a constitution should not contain anything curtailing the rights of the individual. The prohibition amendment destroyed the value of a billion and a half of American property. Suppose that property were British property or French property. Would you permit the French Government or the British Government to interfere with our right to pass a prohibition act because it might involve the interests of French or British property holders?

The misfortune of Mexico is that, being a small people of 15,000,000 souls, she possesses valuable oil fields and other almost inexhaustible natural resources. That is her historical crime. She can not be permitted to live her own life, free from outside interference. Nearly 85 per cent of Mexican property is owned by foreign capital; the large interests of finance and industry are owned by strangers. Only 15 per cent of Mexico's property is held by Mexicans, most of them little shopkeepers. The natural resources of the country are owned and managed by aggregations of foreign capitalists, American capitalists predominating. The Mexicans have been struggling for years to restore to the people their national domain, their own soil, their natural resources. Foreign capital is in the way. If the world is to be improved, if international relations are to be placed on a higher plane than has existed heretofore, there must be certain moral and basic principles recognized in the relations between nations, and one of them is that we should not demand of an outside Government more than we demand from our own; that we should not demand for our citizens greater property rights in a foreign land than the citizens of that land enjoy.

The Mexican people have the right to change their property laws whenever in the interest of Mexico it becomes necessary to change such laws. It is criminal to demand of the Mexican people that they surrender their right to correct mistakes of the past, that they should surrender the right to change property laws when they are shown to be disastrous to the great masses of the people of Mexico. We have no right to demand that the concessions granted by a usurper and a tyrant, as Diaz was conceded to be—that his concessions should become permanent concessions of the land of Mexico to strangers. We must not deny the opportunity and the right to exist to the present Mexican people and to the generations to come. Let us stop being international hypocrites. Let us stop talking about international peace and about international love when in our relations toward smaller nations we act the part of the bully. The Mexican Government should be recognized. The rights of the Mexican people to grow, to change, to develop, to live their own life should not be challenged by our State Department. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. WALSH having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2072) to authorize the Secretary of War to make and receive conveyances effecting an exchange of title to the railroad rights of way at Camp Henry Knox, Ky., and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 7) to amend section 2 of the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution to authorize the operation of Government-owned radio stations for the use of the general public, and for other purposes," approved June 5, 1920, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. PAGE, Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. HALE, Mr. SWANSON, and Mr. PITTMAN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 7158) to amend the Army appropriation act, approved July 11, 1919, so as to release appropriations for the completion of the acquisition of real estate in certain cases and making additional appropriations therefor, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. NEW, Mr. SPENCER, and Mr. MYERS as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE DEPARTMENTS OF COMMERCE AND LABOR.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. ANDREWS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, before we listen to the bombardment from North Carolina against South Carolina as to the birthplace of Andrew Jackson, let us direct attention to a practical question that is pressing for solution. The mention of Gen. Jackson recalls to my mind some interesting history connected with the Treasury Department.

You know that, if you follow the minus sign and the plus sign in the balances of the financial statements of the Treasury Department, you can tell quite readily whether the Republicans were in power or whether the Democrats were in power, the plus sign representing a surplus in the Treasury and the minus sign representing a deficit. The Democrats carry the minus sign and the Republicans the plus sign.

As I turned in thought to the financial history of the past I recalled only one instance in which the Democracy was entitled to the plus sign, and that was in 1836, when Gen. Jackson was helping to manage things and when they are said to have really had a surplus of $42,000,000 in the National Treasury. They did not know what to do with it. They were disturbed about it. So on the 23d day of June, 1836, they enacted a law authorizing the deposit of that money with the States of the Union whose legislative bodies would accept the tender of the amount that would go to the State according to its population.

A number of those States—26—enacted such legislation and accepted the deposits. The deposits were to be made in four installments. After three had been made they thought they would better cancel the authorization and retain the fourth in the Treasury. So to the States that I will name in a moment there was passed money from the National Treasury, from the only Democratic surplus that I now recall in the entire history of the Nation.

We are now earnestly asking the question, Where can we secure the money to pay the soldiers' bonus?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Is the gentleman able to give the source of that Democratic surplus? What was the revenue from which it was produced?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. No; I did not ascertain where they got it. They had it. That is the strangest part of it—they had it.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I understood it was from the sale of public lands.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Let that be as it may. We will not stop to discuss that. There are too many deviations to follow with reference to such conjectures. They had the money, and that is the strange feature of the whole story. That money went to these States, and the States returned certificates of deposit. A few years ago I found that the Treasurer of the United States was carrying these deposits as cash in his vaults; and for 75 years the financial statements of the Treasurer of the United States were about $30,000,000 to the bad. They did not tell the truth by that much.

Then Congress authorized the transfer of those amounts to the ledgers of the Treasury Department, and those States now stand charged with their respective loans. We now need money to pay the bonus. Let us call back these loans from the States, and they will furnish a portion of the funds to pay the bonus. Here is a joint resolution which I intend to introduce to-day:

Whereas the following States are indebted to the Federal Government under the act of June 23, 1836, for the respective amounts set opposite their names:

Maine	$955,838.25
New Hampshire	669,086.79
Massachusetts	1,338,173.58
Vermont	669,086.79
Connecticut	764,670.60
Rhode Island	382,335.30

New York	$4,014,520.71
New Jersey	764,670.60
Pennsylvania	2,867,514.78
Delaware	286,751.49
Maryland	655,838.25
Virginia	2,198,427.99
North Carolina	1,433,757.39
South Carolina	1,051,422.00
Georgia	1,051,422.00
Alabama	669,086.79
Louisiana	477,919.14
Mississippi	382,335.30
Tennessee	1,433,757.39
Kentucky	1,433,757.39
Ohio	2,007,260.34
Missouri	382,335.30
Indiana	860,254.44
Illinois	477,919.14
Michigan	286,751.49
Arkansas	286,751.49
Total	28,101,644.91

and,
Whereas the Federal Treasury is now in urgent need of funds to pay a bonus to the ex-service men of the World War; and
Whereas such deposits are to remain with said States under existing law until otherwise directed by Congress: Therefore be it

Resolved, That such States be, and hereby are, requested and directed to return said deposits to the National Treasury, with interest at 4 per cent per annum from date of deposit.

Resolved further, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to withdraw said deposits with interest from said States in accordance with the terms of section 13 of the act of June 23, 1836, under which they were made.

Apply the rate of 4 per cent to the amounts above set forth and Pennsylvania would pay into the Treasury for the soldiers' bonus $12,735,000. New York would come in with $17,825,000, Ohio with $8,912,000, Virginia with $9,761,000, and altogether they would come in with $124,770,000. Carry this news to Brother FORBNEY for relief and consolation.

Moreover, gentlemen, following up this proposition in the joint resolution which I am introducing to-day, to be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, I hope we can solve this problem to this extent. Surely no State will refuse to aid the National Treasury at this time, because the debts are valid, and the States have been accommodated for 86 years.

Gentlemen, if you want to pay the soldiers' bonus, let these States bring in the money they owe to the Federal Government and we will be $124,000,000 on the way. Will they do it? Let the States answer through their Representatives on this floor. Gentlemen, what will you do?

BRITISH BONDS.

Moreover, where can we get additional funds? We have just passed a bill creating a Foreign Debt Commission. That commission is to secure from the foreign Governments bonds in lieu of the due bills now held in the Treasury. Let me mention the British bonds alone simply as an example of availability. We have loaned to the British Government $4,166,318,358. Taking into account the interest due, Britain owes us approximately $4,883,000,000. Now, what length of time is needed to lay down in the Treasury of the United States the bonds of the British Government? I understand the commission will take the British proposition first. That is good discretion. How much debate is involved in the proposition? Britain concedes by her due bills the principal, and a rate of interest at 5 per cent. Our legislation says the rate of interest shall not drop below 4½ per cent. What is the margin for debate? Only three-quarters of 1 per cent for the great statesmen of the United States and the British Empire to settle. But practically all there is to be done is for Britain to print the bonds, sign them, deliver them to the Treasury of the United States, and take up her due bills. Then you have got the British bonds, approximately $5,000,000,000, out of which to raise the money to pay the soldiers' bonus, plus the $124,000,000 from the States. Gentlemen, let us press the button. We have enacted the legislation. There is no need of a sales tax, no need of any other legislation to increase taxation now. Here are the resources. Let Uncle Sam utilize these securities and thus bring in the money and pay the soldier boys. [Applause.]

I yield back the remainder of my time.

By unanimous consent, leave to extend and revise their remarks in the RECORD was granted to Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska, Mr. KETCHAM, and Mr. CONNALLY of Texas.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD two articles which I have in connection with the bonus from two of the leading Boston newspapers, the Boston Transcript and the Boston Herald. As I have had a large number of telegrams from Boston in respect to my course on the bonus, I would like to insert these two articles, which I think would be very instructive, and I ask that they be inserted also, in view of the remarks of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. ANDREWS] made this afternoon.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I do not like to object to the gentleman extending his remarks. I do not know whether it is going to be the policy of the Republican side of the House to have the bonus debated at this time or not.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I am not going to be in any debate.

Mr. GARNER. It was indulged in yesterday to an extent. Now, we come in with Members on the Republican side of the House speaking of the bonus, and so far as I know there has been no one on this side of the House who has done so. If you are going to open up the question of the bonus for general discussion by inserting editorials and other matter in the RECORD, then the whole matter will be opened up.

I merely call attention of the gentleman who is responsible for the procedure of the House to this continued effort, it seems, by Members on that side of the House to bring into the discussion at this time the question of the bonus. If it is to be indulged in, then we shall all feel at liberty to do the same thing.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK]. [Applause.]

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, in the time which has been allotted to me by the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN], who to-day is in control of the time on the Democratic side of the House, I want to discuss a bill which passed the Senate this week, February 21 (S. 1565), and which has already been messaged to the House and has been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs of the House.

The bill provides that all persons who have served as officers of the United States Army during the World War and who have incurred physical disability in line of duty and who have heretofore or may hereafter be rated at not less than 30 per cent permanent disability by the Veterans' Bureau shall be placed upon the retired Army officers' list at the rank which they held when discharged from the Army, and shall be paid the monthly pay of a retired Army officer.

During my discussion of this bill I shall point out fully its meaning and will show what radical and revolutionary changes it will make, if enacted into law, in the scale of pay for injuries received in the war as between those who served as officers and those who served as privates. I crave the indulgence of the House while I point these things out, and after I have done so, if there is a Member of the House who is willing to defend them and say that it is his interpretation of the spirit of democracy, then I am sure it will be interesting to the House to hear from him and have him give his reasons.

HISTORY OF ARTICLE 3 AS WRITTEN IN THE ORIGINAL WAR RISK INSURANCE BILL.

If the Committee on Military Affairs of the House makes a favorable report on this Senate bill, and if the House should pass it as the Senate has passed it, it will bring about the very same sort of discriminatory features which were carried in the original war risk insurance act and which the House refused to accept. I remember these discriminatory features in the original act very well, indeed, for I led the fight against them, offered a series of amendments to correct them, and my amendments were adopted by a vote of 139 to 3. My amendments rewrote the whole plan of article 3 of the war risk insurance act as originally reported to the House, and when the bill went to the Senate no change was made in the plan. I now have here before me a copy of the original war risk insurance bill, which was introduced by Representative Alexander, of Missouri, and reported to the House by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. By an examination of this bill we will find that both the death benefits and the compensation payments for disability provided for in article 3 were written upon the percentage basis. By that expression I mean that in case a soldier was killed in the service the amount that was to be paid by the Government to his dependents because of his death was a percentage of the pay that he was receiving in the Army at the time of his death, or if he was not killed but was only disabled the payments to him for such disability were to be made on the same basis. Just how these percentage payments would have worked out in practice was pointed out in a speech which I made in the House on September 13, 1917, in support of my amendments to strike them out and substitute for them equal, specific amounts. Under leave to extend my remarks, I herewith insert a brief account of the adoption of these amendments which was published in the September, 1917, issue of the Survey, reading as follows:

By a vote of 139 to 3 the House wrote into the soldiers' and sailors' insurance bill before its passage, on September 13, the principle of equal care as between the dependents of officers and of private soldiers and sailors. The amendments offered by Representative BLACK, of Texas, indorsed in this decisive fashion, provide that the payment to be made to the dependents of soldiers and sailors killed or totally disabled shall be specific rather than based on a percentage of the pay of the dead or disabled man.

Congressman BLACK, with a number of other Members of the House, assailed the committee's plan of compensation based on the rate of pay of the soldier or officer as being an attempt to establish class and caste in America, "while we are carrying on a war for democracy." Mr. BLACK termed it "preserving the distinction of rank and pay beyond the borders of the grave."

Representative Alexander, of Missouri, one of the Members who had charge of the bill in the House, gave his entire approval to the Black amendments when the measure was finally passed. He said:

"It was clearly demonstrated in the debate that the House considered it only fair that there be established complete equality in treatment, as to this compensation on the Government's part, of the dependents of all in the service."

As I have already stated, this Senate bill No. 1565 now proposes to undo at least one part of the work which the House did in 1917 and change the rule of equal payments to the soldier who was injured or disabled in the service and pay different amounts of compensation as between officers and privates. When the bill was originally before the House in September, 1917, it was contended by the advocates of the percentage basis that the system was justified because of the difference in earning capacity as between officer and enlisted man. That view of the matter was put forward by Mr. Dewalt, of Pennsylvania, a very able Member of the House, in the following language, which I quote from his speech. He said:

It is said that this compensation feature is unjust because it makes a discrimination against the private in favor of the officer. Is that true? No; it is not. Apparently it does; but when you reason it out to its conclusion it does not. Why? Because the earning capacity of every man must be taken into consideration when you consider the compensation feature in the law. In other words, in fixing compensation under all the statutes in all the States there is always taken into consideration as a primal fact—first, the age of the individual; second, the number of people that he has dependent upon him; and third, the earning capacity which he has in order to sustain himself and the people dependent upon him.

To this argument of Mr. Dewalt I replied in my speech, as follows:

If the premise of Mr. Dewalt is correct, then the reason which he advances is a good one, but I dispute the correctness of the premise. He says that these benefits are based upon the earning capacity of the individual. It is true that our State compensation laws, after which, no doubt, this bill was modeled, are built upon that basis, and no doubt in civil occupation it is a sound basis. But, gentlemen, it must be remembered that we are drafting into the Army men without the liberty of choice. They must serve as and when and where they are placed. In civil life a man has a liberty of choice, and presumably he selects that occupation and reaches that remuneration for which he is qualified. But when he goes into the Army he surrenders the liberty of choice. And under the operation of the selective draft law we may take a man out of the civil walks of life that is earning to-day—and there is not a bit of doubt but that some will be taken—who are now earning more than even a major general in the United States Army, and yet his compensation as a private in the Army would be $30 a month and his benefits under this compensation article would be based upon that amount. Can it be said in such a case that the benefits provided for himself and dependents would be based upon his earning capacity? No; indeed; it would not be. Then, where is the just reason for this wide difference of benefits? I call upon the committee for a better reason than they have thus far advanced. I say the premise is not correct, and you can not take as a model for these compensation laws in the Army the compensation laws of the several States, because they are based upon the civil walks of life, where each man has the liberty of choice in selecting his civil occupation.

After the whole matter had been thoroughly debated in the House, a vote was taken upon my series of amendments to equalize both the death and disability benefits of the law, and these amendments were adopted, as I have already stated, by a vote of 139 to 3. So far as I know, this Senate bill, bill No. 1565, has been the first legislative effort which has been brought forward to change the plan of equality which the House so overwhelmingly adopted in 1917. And it will not be passed if I can do anything to prevent it.

Mr. GARNER. If the gentleman will permit, this Senate bill to which the gentleman refers has in it a greater discrimination than any to which the gentleman has yet referred, and that is the provision which would retire an officer who has only received a 30 per cent disability and pay him the same retirement pay as an officer who has received a total disability.

Mr. BLACK. I am glad my colleague calls attention to that particular provision of the bill, because that is one feature of it to which I want to devote some especial attention, if I have the time.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes; I yield to my friend from Alabama.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I just want to call attention to the fact that every volunteer officer of the Civil War has been denied this very thing during all these years that have passed since the Civil War.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman is exactly right, and they have been righteously denied the privilege. The policy of the Government has been to pay equal Civil War pensions to both privates and officers. Now, what will happen if the Congress passes this Senate bill?

RESULTS OF THE BILL IF IT BECOMES A LAW.

If the bill is passed, any officer who incurred a disability of not less than 30 per cent may be retired as an Army officer and if he should be so retired would draw three-fourths of the pay each month which would be paid to the same grade officer in the active service. What would be the result? An officer or private whose disability has been rated 30 per cent partial and permanent under existing law now draws $30 per month. If this Senate bill becomes a law, an officer who served as captain in the World War and has only this 30 per cent disability could and would be retired at $150 per month, a major at $187 per month, a lieutenant colonel at $218 per month, and a colonel at $250 per month.

Senator KING, in debating this measure in the Senate on February 21, stated that he had been advised by one of the efficiency experts of the Government that the increased cost of the operation of the bill for the first year would be $4,000,000. I have no doubt but that his figures are less, rather than more, than the bill will actually cost each year if it is enacted. While the question of the increased cost which the bill would impose upon the Treasury is the least of the evils which I see in its passage, still, in view of the enormous sums of money which the Federal Government must raise in taxation, it is a solemn duty of Members of Congress to give some attention to economy. I am willing to vote for generous sums to pay compensation to the disabled and wounded, but I am not willing to vote for a law which would make a distinction in payment for equal injuries received, as between officers and privates.

I stand on that question just where I stood in 1917 when I offered my amendments to the original war risk insurance act to equalize the benefits.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLACK. May I have one or two minutes more?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 10 minutes remaining.

Mr. GRIFFIN. That is reserved for the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] here, and I can not yield to the gentleman from Texas, I am sorry to say.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] 10 minutes, the remainder of my time.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I voice the sentiments of 99 per cent of the people of Alabama in urging upon Congress that Henry Ford's offer for Muscle Shoals be accepted and that the offer which has been made by the Alabama Power Co. be rejected with contempt.

The people of my State are deeply concerned over the present situation. They are wrought up to an extraordinary degree. They are stirred as they have never been stirred before over the developments concerning the disposition of Muscle Shoals and upon the offers which have been made concerning it. Within the past few days action upon the subject has been taken by practically every organization in the State. Civic bodies, veterans' societies, labor organizations, farm organizations, and women's clubs have had their meetings and passed resolutions expressing in one form or another the sentiments with which I began these remarks. Mass meetings have been held in many of the cities and towns for the purpose of expressing those sentiments and presenting them to Congress.

In my own city of Birmingham, two days ago, a public meeting was held which packed our largest theater, and from which more than a thousand people were turned away, at which those sentiments were unanimously expressed. I believe that I am safe in saying that the people of Alabama rather than have Ford's offer rejected and the Alabama Power Co. placed in control at Muscle Shoals would rather see the majestic Tennessee River remain undeveloped, and for another quarter of a century roll on unharnessed to the sea.

ALABAMA TRUSTS FORD, FEARS POWER COMPANY.

The profound emotion which stirs the people of Alabama may not be understood by those unfamiliar with our local conditions. To understand our feelings it is necessary to know something on the one hand of the history and activities of the Alabama Power Co., and on the other of what we expect from development by Ford.

The people of Alabama trust Henry Ford. They believe in him. They regard him as the exemplar of the best in modern American industry. He is no ruthless dollar grabber. He holds to honorable competition and not to monopoly gained through corrupt methods and oppressive practices. He does not grind the face of labor and take advantage of its every extremity to extort the greatest possible amount of toil for the least possible return. He is not an oppressor of the poor. He has some higher ideal than the worship of the dollar made god. We feel that he is sincere in saying that he does not desire the opportunities of Muscle Shoals for mere profit making but that he wishes to build there a great industrial community which will be a monument to himself when he is gone.

Ford sees a great vision at Muscle Shoals—immediate employment of idle hands with eventually profitable work for a million men—cheap fertilizer for our farmers—the loosening of the stranglehold on industry by the productions of the electric furnace—defeat of monopolies in necessities of life and industry now held by selfish interests, and, finally, the building of a great industrial community with a happy population of well-paid and productive workers. The people of Alabama believe in Ford. They believe in his vision. They see the vision with him. They commit themselves unreservedly to the hope that the vision may be made a reality.

WHY POWER COMPANY IS FEARED.

On the other hand, let us consider the views of the people of Alabama as to the Alabama Power Co. That company is a subsidiary of the Alabama Light, Power & Traction Co., a Canadian corporation, owned in chief by Edgar, the London banker. The power company was organized some 15 years ago. Its beginnings were quite modest, as its capital was limited. Its organizers had no such ambitions as the present owners of the concern. Shortly prior to 1908 the attention of British capitalists was directed to the water-power possibilities of our State. They found Alabama to be probably the richest water-power State east of the Mississippi. It is said that our water power aggregates probably about 2,000,000 horsepower, the equivalent of some five Niagaras as at present developed.

These British interests proceeded quietly to get control of the Alabama Power Co. and to acquire all the desirable power sites in the State. They sent their spies throughout the State and along remote mountain streams and into the least developed parts of the State. They found the best places where dams might be located. They took over these sites, sometimes buying only a few acres, the key to the situation, which was purchased for a trifling sum from some uninformed owner. Then they began their siege of the State government. Always there were local parties who could be used as their instruments.

Our legislature was unaware of the scheme to entrap them. They surrendered to the devious methods of this great selfish interest and were hoodwinked into passing our power act of 1908. By that act the State of Alabama practically abdicated its sovereignty over its greatest natural asset, the use of its splendid rivers for the production of power. The act granted in perpetuity to the owners of power sites the right to construct their dams and works without payment to the State of one cent in return therefor. The act also granted the State's power of eminent domain for the condemnation of lands for flowage and other purposes, and this without a cent in return. To crown its folly the legislature granted an exemption from taxation for all works of water-power development. The Alabama Power Co. having acquired all the best of the power sites, the practical effect of the act was to grant to that corporation a perpetual monopoly of water power in Alabama.

Following the passage of that act the Alabama Power Co. constructed a power plant at Lock 12 on the Coosa River, and is now engaged in constructing another plant a few miles farther down the Coosa. In aid of its power monopoly it has acquired certain other plants, including fuel plants, and has taken over certain street car lines and lighting systems already in operation. But it has done nothing further to develop the water powers of our State. The rivers flow on unharnessed. The power company owns the dam sites. It will not or can not develop them, and, like a dog in the manger, allows no other interest to do so.

HAS BEEN IN POLITICS FROM BEGINNING.

But this is only a part of the story. The Alabama Power Co. has been in politics from the beginning. It has had its State governor, its legislators, and other officials. It has had its champions in Congress. It has tainted the judgments of our courts. The slime of its trail has befouled our elections. It has its subsidized newspapers. As Ford stands for the best in American industry, so does the Alabama Power Co. stand for the lowest in our industrial life.

The Alabama Power Co. covers our State with the menace of its influence; it impedes progress; it blocks all development from which it does not draw profits. The grant of Muscle Shoals to this great selfish concern will give it a monopoly in water-power production in the richest power State east of the Rockies. It will place the throttling fingers of this merciless concern around the throat of Southern industry. It will thwart the development possibilities of the section of the South greatest in natural resources. It will prevent during the years of the ascendancy of this company the legitimate growth of a section great in industrial possibilities. But worse than all, it will block the political, social, and educational development of that section. Alabama does not want to be a rotten borough under the domination of a great industrial interest.

It is my desire not to overexpress the feelings of the people of my State and not to make extravagant statements. It would be hard, indeed, for me to overstate the opposition of my people to the grant of Muscle Shoals to the Alabama Power Co. We know what to expect from that company. As we trust Ford, we fear the Alabama Power Co. As Ford is humane, that company is selfish. As he depends for success upon legitimate competition, it relies upon monopoly and oppressive practices. As he refrains from meddling with matters of government, it exerts a malign influence on public affairs. As he pays decent wages, the Alabama Power Co. is now, upon the works which it is building upon Coosa River, taking the labor of men for as little as $1.25 a day.

A TOOL OF THE GREAT TRUSTS TO STRIKE FORD.

But there is yet another aspect of this situation. We of Alabama know that the Alabama Power Co. is not acting for itself alone in making an offer for Muscle Shoals. The real purpose of the offer is to defeat Henry Ford's offer and the competition for the great trusts which lies in his acquisition of Muscle Shoals. The Alabama Power Co. is ambitious, it has its "great expectations," but it has not the financial strength to put through the offer that it has made. It has received assurances from outsiders who use it as a tool with which to strike at Ford—the Virginia-Carolina Chemical Co., the fertilizer trust, the General Chemical Co., the chemical trust, and the great trusts which by reason of their monopolies gained by secret processes of production and devious business methods in nitrates, aluminum, abrasives, steel alloys, and carbide—these colossal concerns are deeply concerned in preventing Ford's development of Muscle Shoals. They squat at Niagara clutching the throat of American industry, and through their Wall Street affiliations are well able to finance any adventure which promises to further their aims. They can well afford to see to it that the Alabama Power Co. is furnished with the resources with which to make its offer. Their Washington lobbyists are coordinated and in action. The Alabama Power Co. offer is obviously the fruit of a conspiracy which they have concocted.

SHALL OUR MEANS OF DEFENSE BE UNDER BRITISH CONTROL?

And now let us turn from the terrible to the ridiculous. Our Government is interested in Muscle Shoals primarily for the purpose of producing nitrates for the manufacture of explosives in time of war. As a measure of national defense we want to be independent of foreign sources of nitrate. It was for that purpose that the development of Muscle Shoals was entered upon—for that all our millions were poured out there. And now this subsidiary of a British corporation dares to propose that it shall be intrusted with that governmental interest. Think of the colossal impudence of it! How do we know; perhaps our next war may be with the Government to which the chief owner of this company owes his allegiance. We should then find ourselves confronted with a situation in which we would have to rely upon this foreigner for an essential means for the defense of our country.

Sensing the storm raised by its offer the Alabama Power Co. is calling for support from the Southern newspapers. It is now engaged in an expensive advertising campaign which seems to have little purpose other than as a graceful means of putting some money into publishers' pockets, since there is little sense or substance in the matter printed. It is spending hundreds of dollars in this way. It is characteristic of this concern that it should rally newspaper support by this means. This is not the first time that the Alabama Power Co. has spent large sums on advertising for the purpose of affecting political events. Unfortunately there are indications that the money being spent in this way is accomplishing something of its object. In the case of at least two of the dailies there are signs of weakening in their interest in Ford's offer. But the weakening of these newspapers has developed no corresponding relaxation upon the part of the people. To the contrary, it is met by still greater feeling upon their part and by their overwhelming insistence that Ford's offer shall be accepted and that the Alabama Power Co.'s offer shall be spurned.

Perhaps it may be considered that it is premature for me to speak upon this subject while the Committee on Military Affairs is yet considering it, but when you realize how deep are the emotions of the people of Alabama and how profoundly indignant they are over the present situation you will agree that they have a right to have their sentiments voiced in this Chamber. [Applause.]

As illustrative of the nature of the resolutions to which I have referred I include in my remarks four of them which are typical:

Resolutions adopted by the Kiwanis Club of Talladega, Ala.

Whereas the Alabama Power Co. has made a bid to the Government for the acquisition of Muscle Shoals and all subsidiary plants; and Whereas the Alabama Power Co. already has practically a monopoly on all water-power rights in Alabama except Muscle Shoals, which rights now possessed will require years to develop; and Whereas it is the opinion of this club that any further grant of power to that company would be a calamity not only to Alabama but to the entire territory contiguous thereto, and would retard development of this country commercially and agriculturally for years to come; and Whereas it is the opinion of this club that the offer of Henry Ford would, if accepted, redound to the good of the whole country, and especially the agricultural interests: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Kiwanis Club of Talladega go on record as opposed to the Alabama Power Co. offer and in favor of the Ford offer.

Second. That the Alabama delegation in Congress and the Senate be urged to use their influence in behalf of the Ford offer and against the Alabama Power Co. offer.

Third. That a copy of these resolutions be mailed to each Congressman and Senator from Alabama.

Resolutions adopted at mass meeting in Birmingham.

Whereas the great question before the American people to-day and the Congress of the United States in the proper utilization for the benefit of all the people of America, is the great natural resources that have remained dormant for 100 years or more at Muscle Shoals, Ala.; and

Whereas Henry Ford, the mechanical wizard of the age, has made a proposal to the Government that meets with almost unanimous approval of the people of the entire Nation and apparently a large number of Representatives in Congress and the Senate; and

Whereas Mr. Ford's offer for the operation of the Muscle Shoals properties was made in good faith to the proper person as spokesman for the Government, Secretary of War Weeks, and after due consideration by the Secretary of War was submitted to Congress for its approval or rejection and was apparently about to be ratified; and

Whereas selfish interests such as the Fertilizer Trust, power monopolies, and others supported by the gigantic moneyed powers of Wall Street are opposed to the Government disposing of these resources in a way that would be of benefit to the people as a whole; and

Whereas a sequel to this great opposition is shown by the submission of a bid by the Alabama Power Co., a foreign corporation that has never been of any material benefit to anyone other than the stockholders, who are citizens principally of foreign countries: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, the citizens of the Birmingham district in mass meeting assembled this, the 19th day of February, 1922, go on record as being unalterably opposed to the Government of the United States considering the bid of the Alabama Power Co.; and be it further

Resolved, That we, the citizens of this district, heartily indorse and unqualifiedly recommend that the proposal of Henry Ford be accepted and entered into by the Government for operation of the Muscle Shoals properties; and be it further

Resolved, That these resolutions be given the widest publicity by furnishing same to the press and that a committee of five be appointed by the chairman of this meeting to forward copies of these resolutions to our two Senators and Representatives in Congress, and the committees of Congress before whom the proposals are now pending.

Resolutions adopted by Camp Hardee, United Confederate Veterans.

Whereas there is a bill now pending in Congress for the disposition of Muscle Shoals; and whereas the people are vitally interested in this project, believing this giant power, sleeping for ages on the bosom of the Tennessee, can be made a great blessing not only to the people of Alabama but to the entire South and West, developing a great plant for the manufacture of cheap fertilizers for the farmers and opening up navigation and commerce of the West and Southwest, also cheapening freights by furnishing electric power to railroads; in fact, putting new energy and hope in the South and giving employment to thousands of people.

Whereas Henry Ford accepted an invitation of the Government to make a bid, and after thorough inspection, in company with that American genius, Edison, who says that his project is practical and O. K'd his bid to the Government as fair, the Secretary of War, after delaying a report to Congress for months, finally has submitted Henry Ford's bid with criticism and not with friendly aid; now at the eleventh hour the Alabama Power Co., a foreign corporation, growing fat by its greed in Alabama, comes forward seemingly aided by all the corporations interested, and seeing that Mr. Ford would compete with them, makes a competitive bid.

Whereas the world knows what Henry Ford has accomplished as a manufacturer; the world knows what Edison has accomplished in his line; they do not know what this Secretary of War and his henchmen have ever done, except to sit still and let the waters of the beautiful Tennessee flow on to sea undisturbed by the genius of man; but the world suspects they are aiding a foreign corporation and capitalistic associates in putting in possession a corporation which already has its hands upon the throat of Alabama and which has been exempted by the legislature from taxes for 10 years, and in the meantime getting its hands upon the most valuable water power of the United States, not for the people but exclusively for its own profit.

Now, therefore, we heartily endorse Mr. Ford's bid and ask our Representatives, together with our Senators, to do all in their power to give this contract to Henry Ford.

Resolution adopted by the commissioners of the city of Birmingham, Ala.

We urge the Government to accept the offer of Henry Ford for Muscle Shoals because we believe that it will be developed by him for the benefit of the American people. We protest against the acceptance of the offer of the Alabama Power Co., because it would insure to it the control of all large water-power sites in the State of Alabama and thereby fasten upon our people for all time a water power monopoly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. RICKETTS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized.

Mr. RICKETTS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, the Executive and independent offices bill before the House on the 30th day of January, 1922, carried, among other things, an appropriation for the support and maintenance of the vocational training school at Camp Sherman, Ohio.

At the conclusion of the reading of the bill, under the five-minute rule, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. REECE] offered an amendment which struck out of the bill this appropriation. Unless this appropriation has been put back in the bill by the Senate, this vocational training school for disabled soldiers suffering a handicap which prevents them from following their original employment or vocation will be discontinued. I can hardly imagine a greater calamity to the disabled soldiers of this country than the discontinuance of this school. The school has only been in operation since December 1, 1921. It is just in its infancy. It is a new project, and Col. Forbes, Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau, has his heart and soul set on the success of this school. It is an experiment which he desires to try out for the purpose of demonstrating fully its feasibility, practicability, and real value to the soldiers who seek rehabilitation. I have never talked to the President concerning the school, but I dare say that it has his approval and sanction or Col. Forbes would not have initiated the project.

This vocational training school is located in Ross County, one of the five counties composing the district which I have the honor to represent. I can not tell you how deeply interested I am in the success of this school. I know that the establishment of the school is a new idea which originated in the mind of Col. Forbes and that it will require, of necessity, an annual appropriation of the people's money in order to support and maintain it for the present; but when it is established and fully equipped there is no question but that it will be in a measure self-supporting if not altogether self-supporting.

It is the policy of Congress to give these unfortunate soldier boys vocational training and make them efficient citizens, and to repair, so far as possible, their injuries. They fought our battles. They made the sacrifice. They won the war and saved the country, and when we asked them to bear this burden every appropriation was made in order to fully equip them to serve their country. No Member of this House then hesitated for a second to make any appropriation that was necessary in order to promote the success of the American soldiers. Now, when these boys come back, maimed and disabled, and disqualified to follow their original occupation or vocation, this Congress should make such appropriations as will make reparation to them as far as possible. It is to the interest of the country, as well as to these maimed and disabled soldiers, to make them efficient, self-supporting citizens. The same generous appropriations should be made for the purposes of rehabilitation and vocational training as were made to equip these boys to fight our battles in foreign lands, and I know of no better way to carry out this policy than for Congress to make an appropriation which will support and maintain this school, and that will insure these disabled soldiers the chance they deserve to equip themselves to wrestle with life's problems. [Applause.]

Many criticisms have been made against this project, both by Members of this House and by certain other individuals. Some of them are without foundation. But few Members of this House, and but few men in the country, know the facts in relation to the establishment and progress of this school and the exceptional fitness of Camp Sherman for a project of this kind.

Mr. Marx, head of the disabled soldiers' organization of the country, quite recently criticized this project severely through the press. I do not know the gentleman personally, but I do know that his criticism was unwarranted and grossly unfair.

I have made a thorough investigation of the facts in relation to the conduct and operation of this school, and it is my purpose to-day to bring these facts to the attention of the membership of this House. I know that every Member here wants to be fair. I know that you want to do what is best in the premises. For that reason, I will submit for your consideration the following facts pertaining to this project:

On or about January 21 of this year, and after Mr. Marx's article had appeared in the press criticizing this school, a committee of the American Legion of Franklin County, in which is located the city of Columbus, the capital of Ohio, made a complete investigation of this school and submitted the following report:

We proceeded to Camp Sherman, Saturday, January 21, investigated the different departments, talked to the men and instructors unofficially, without disclosing our identities, and spoke with the officers of the Sherman Tech Association, an association made up of the men in training for self-government, law, and order. Our report should be preceded by the statement that "any monkey can tear down, where it takes a man to build up."

We found living conditions good; food good; training facilities good, on the arrival of more equipment; instructors fair; health and medical conditions good; location fine; and general morale fair. The main reason for lack of morale seems to be a disturbed condition because of the recent reports of men endeavoring to tear down the plan. Mr. Michael J. Lyons and Sidney W. Lawrence, chairman and secretary of the tech association, stated that Judge Marx is doing the camp more wrong than good. He did not give the camp a fair investigation.

Realizing the great troubles with placement training, and realizing that this camp does away with a great number of these troubles, we wish to approve of Camp Sherman as it is, for single men, as long as the school does not try to attain the degree-granting power.

(Signed) THE COMMITTEE,

W. WM. WILLING, Chairman,
Commander University Post, 150, American Legion.

JAMES M. PATCHELL,
President Zero Hour Club, Ohio State University, American Legion.

HENRY M. GREEN,
Commander 136 F. A., American Legion.

I have also received a petition from the students now in training at the Camp Sherman School, which I desire to bring to your attention, and the same is as follows:

JANUARY 31, 1922.

We, the undersigned students of the electrical department of the United States Veterans' Bureau Vocational School No. 1, wish to take this means and at this time voice our hearty disapproval of the various interests working to the end of discontinuing this school.

While we realize that this school is at present incomplete we have faith in the project and feel that the course offered is of a practicable nature and that in a very short time all will be working smoothly.

We wish to emphatically register our objections to the false statements made by Judge Robert Marx while on a recent visit to this school and consider his report a reflection on our intelligence.

Edward C. Winters, Jr., John H. Dixon, Edward W. Schott, Francis G. Milen, Wm. Briener, Geo. D. Turner, C. M. Campbell, John H. Bridley, Fred Stevens, John Saglet, Carl Stanones, James E. Slusfer, B. Campbell, George A. Long, J. Kinney, Thos. J. Harrington, Geo. Scully, Fred Schroeder, William G. Fitzsimmons, P. Mills, John E. Frost, J. N. Robert, Aaron Knechtel, C. O. Williams, James Chaloupka, G. P. Williams, Chas. R. Cook, Tony White, J. Kessler, Chas. F. East, Edward Betts, Richard Zimmerman, Herman P. Craddock, Loren M. Gant, Walter D. Province, Elias H. Butler, Thomas J. Moran, Raymond D. Cunningham, Allen H. Wilson, Patrick J. O'Keefe, Chas. R. Runge, Oscar T. Rhoads, Edwin Manly, Alfred McDonald, Henry P. Arcanti, Julius Fine, Wm. Adelson, Rufus Wiseman.

The equipment required in this report arrived at the school soon after the investigation was made by this committee and is now being installed. This school had been in progress at the time this investigation was made less than two months, and in spite of the fact that the school had just gotten under way the general conditions were found to be satisfactory by a committee of experts, American Legion men, who have at heart the welfare of the disabled soldiers of the country and who are most deeply interested in their successful rehabilitation.

This report squarely contradicts the statements given out by Mr. Marx. He assumes the rôle of critic, and he makes no suggestions to Col. Forbes or to Congress. The secret investigation of these men on this committee of this school was for the purpose of determining whether or not the criticisms of Mr. Marx were founded upon fact. The propaganda of Mr. Marx clearly shows that he is prejudiced. Why did he not make his criticism to Col. Forbes or to the commander in charge of this school? Was he seeking notoriety? Did he rush into the press for the purposes of publicity? Was he seeking to stir up dissension and strife among the students of this school? Did he have in mind to prejudice the Congress and the country against the school?

This school was opened on the 1st day of December, 1921, and approximately 300 students have been enrolled since that time. Some students have been returned to their districts because they were not able mentally, and some of them physically, to take the training. The approximate cost per student at the present time is about $35 per month, which includes tuition, books, supplies, and equipment. It can be readily seen from the above statement that an enrollment of 1,000 students would decrease the cost per month considerably.

The total number of trainees receiving vocational and pre-vocational training in hospitals and training centers is 14,637. The total cost of training in hospitals and training centers is estimated at $3,012,576.75. This amount is distributed as follows:

Teachers' salaries	$1,543,895.00
Equipment	866,707.38
Supplies	175,524.08
Travel	39,307.56
Subsistence	6,453.48
Tuition	22,043.90
Rent	298,465.65
Construction and labor	60,179.70
Total cost	3,012,576.75

The average cost per trainee per month is $17.15.

In compiling these figures the maintenance pay and administrative cost is eliminated and the figures submitted show the actual amount expended for training only.

In reference to trainees' training in hospitals it must be understood that a large number of these trainees are not receiving training that will remove their vocational handicap, but it is given with a view to reconstruction through occupational therapy. The total number of men training with a view to vocational rehabilitation is 5,035 in the various training centers.

The total amount spent for training trainees in the various universities, special schools, and colleges is $13,678,860.54. This amount is distributed as follows:

Teachers' salaries	$21,320.00
Supplies	1,832,676.84
Travel	401,272.38
Subsistence	65,879.88
Tuition	11,357,711.44
Total	13,678,860.54

The total number of institutions is 3,188. The total number of trainees receiving institutional training, 49,909. The average cost per trainee per month is $22.84. This average cost does not include maintenance and administrative cost.

The above information does not include trainees placed in establishments.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICKETTS. Certainly; glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman spoke of the appropriation being eliminated.

Mr. RICKETTS. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. What is to become of the school?

Mr. RICKETTS. If no appropriation is made all the work that has been done since December 1 up to this time will be undone.

Mr. BLANTON. And what is to become of these young men?

Mr. RICKETTS. They will be turned loose to go some place else to receive vocational training.

Mr. BLANTON. That is, on June 30?

Mr. RICKETTS. Yes; surely they will. They will not have a dollar with which to maintain this school after June 30 unless an appropriation is made.

VOCATIONAL TRAINING.

The following is a correct statement of the courses which are placed at the disposal of the disabled soldiers in training at the Camp Sherman School, together with descriptive matter of buildings, equipment, and so forth:

VOCATIONAL SCHOOL I.

COURSES OF INSTRUCTION—TRADES NOW BEING TAUGHT.

Automotive trades: Auto mechanics, ignition, storage batteries, vulcanizing.

Woodworking trades: Carpentry, cabinetmaking.

Electrical courses.

Painting trades: Sign painting, vehicle painting.

Sheet metal, shoe repairing, tailoring, typewriter repair, upholstery and auto trim, baking, cooking, laundering, nursing (male).

Machine-shop work soon will be offered; machinery being placed; equipment being assembled.

Telegraphy and wireless probably will be offered in near future.

AGRICULTURAL COURSES (WORK JUST BEGUN).

Agronomy: Soils, farm crops, fertilizer, etc.

Economic entomology and botany: Insects, plant diseases, bee culture.

Animal husbandry: Live stock (general stock farming), poultry, dairying, swine and sheep.

Dairy manufacturing: Creamery management, butter making, cheese making, ice-cream making.

Horticulture: Gardening, small fruits, orcharding.

Farm mechanics: Automotive power, implements, machinery, repair of tools, carpentry, concrete.

Farm management: Gentlemen estates, stock farms, poultry farms, etc.

Related education: English, history, arithmetic, geography, drafting, current events.

Type of men to be trained: Men of little or no education. The established schools and colleges are finding it difficult to handle men with very limited educational background. There is a real need for schools of this kind, especially in agriculture. There are many hundreds of men drawing training pay who are not getting the training for which the Government is paying. This school can give proper training for such men as should come here.

Type of instruction given: All instruction is practical, supplemented by as much theory as may be necessary to give a man proper training in his employment objective.

Concerning dormitories: Two-story buildings, light and pleasant.

There are eight dormitories, containing 470 beds.

Most of the rooms have a single bed, a bureau with mirror, table, two chairs, curtains at windows, and small rug on floor.

Rooms and hallways are painted soft colors.

Writing table and lounging chairs are in the halls.

Toilets, bath tubs, and shower baths are well arranged and near rooms.

Buildings are steam heated and well lighted with electricity.

Charge is $5 per month per man, and this includes maid service.

Each building has a matron in charge of it.

Dormitories for agricultural students: There are several buildings in a single group, all divided into rooms with radiators and electric fixtures, which, with comparatively little work, will give housing facilities for 400 students. In the center of the buildings is a dining hall and kitchen suitable for 400. Also in the same group are shops, classrooms, and assembly hall.

Homes for married students: Married men find it very hard to get training and also live with their families. There are a large number of one-story buildings—officers' quarters, latrines—which with very little work will make excellent homes for families of trainees, especially good for men training in agriculture.

Concerning dining hall: Large building, well lighted; floor seats 330, balcony 170; tables have porcelain tops; each table seats 6.

Food is excellent, wholesome, clean, and student may have as many helpings as he wishes.

Charge for food is $20 per month.

Men waiters are employed; it is not run on cafeteria plan.

Buildings used for trade course: These buildings are remodeled warehouses, about 200 feet long by 60 feet wide, very light; excellent shops.

Training in forestry: The State of Ohio has appropriated $10,000 for a forest nursery and for reforestation. The State intends to establish an excellent nursery near or on Camp Sherman and will offer the opportunity to disabled service men to receive training on this nursery. There are few practical forestry courses other than four-year college courses. There are no such courses between Missoula, Mont., and Pennsylvania State College. There are possibly 200 men who want forestry courses and can not get them. This school could care for 50 men this spring and summer.

Agricultural education in general: There is a decided need for agricultural training of the kind which is contemplated here. It is very difficult to find sufficient training opportunity for men who have been disabled and who have very limited education. They are too old to enter the usual preparatory schools and can not easily adjust themselves in our existing colleges. The special agricultural courses formed in our present colleges are greatly overcrowded, and there are many boys from agricultural areas who do not have the courage to attempt training because of their limited education at existing college institutions. When it becomes known that this is a school for just such young men with very limited or no education, it will be easy to secure a thousand for training in agriculture.

The climatic conditions are ideal. The latitude is nearly the same as that of Washington, and weather conditions are more favorable. There is no reason why a young man with a disability and with no education can not be returned to his home farm or established upon another farm with every opportunity for success after training at a school of this type.

Stock judging and show pavilion: There is a large group of buildings with cement floors, well fenced-in yards, etc., which will make an ideal stock judge and show pavilion. A most creditable county fair could be held at this place.

Stock buildings—Agriculture: There are several buildings (latrines) with cement floors which will make perfect buildings for swine and sheep. In some instances they are almost entirely ready for stock.

Related educational courses: This school plans to give careful attention to the men of little or no education. By reducing illiteracy the man becomes a better mechanic or farmer, and the time needed for rehabilitation becomes proportionately less. Every effort will be made to make the men understand American ideals and standards.

Three stereopticon lectures or moving pictures are to be offered once a week or once every two weeks, which will be of an instructional nature, such as a model dairy farm, disease prevention, model homes for the farm, pictures showing geography, history, etc.

Recreation: Every effort is being made to give wholesome recreation. Social gatherings are held at the Hostess House, at which time young women with chaperons come from the town. Dancing is indulged in. Moving pictures are offered two or three times per week at the nominal price of 15 cents, which is enough to cover costs. Special gatherings are held from time to time. Glee clubs, orchestras, and a band are being encouraged and formed.

Attitude of students toward the school: Contrary to criticisms of the type of Judge Marx, the attitude of the students toward this school is excellent. Unfortunately, a number of men were sent here who had been failures elsewhere, and probably will be failures so far as rehabilitation is concerned, for all they are looking for is the pay check. These undesirable students have either requested transfer and have left or it was necessary to send them away. The present student body heartily resents many of the articles which have been published. They recognize the square deal which they are getting.

Mission of this school: Men of limited education who really need to be rehabilitated have had much to contend against. This school can be made to serve the needs of just such fellows. They do not fit into any existing scheme of education, and this school can develop courses of training suitable to the needs of each particular case, irrespective of the previous education or occupation and irrespective of the man's disability. This is the special function of such a school as this.

Certificate or diploma: Every man successfully completing his course will receive a diploma or certificate, signed by the President. This will be comparable to the diploma or certificate given by colleges offering two-year noncollegiate courses or to the diploma of a night school.

UNITED STATES VETERANS' BUREAU
VOCATIONAL SCHOOL, No. 1,
Chillicothe, Ohio, January 20, 1922.

TRADE AND INDUSTRIAL SECTION INFORMATION REGARDING COURSES.

1. The following is a brief discussion of the character of the instruction and of the aims of the different courses offered in the trade industrial section:

AUTOMOBILE TRADES.

2. Most of the men in the automobile maintenance trades were assigned a trade objective covered by the term "auto mechanic." It is the intention that the general auto mechanic shall be able to do the various kinds of automobile repair work done in the ordinary well-equipped garage or service station, or that he shall be qualified for the class of work done by the so-called "service-department road man," who is generally considered the highest type of "repairman expert."

3. To attain the necessary knowledge of the various special branches of automobile maintenance the general auto mechanic spends enough time in the storage-battery department, the ignition, starting, and lighting department, and the tire-repair department to make him familiar with such work and to train him to do as much of such special work as he might be expected to be able to do as a traveling service man or as a garage foreman.

4. The starting, lighting, and ignition department is training men to be specialists in the field of repairing all types of electrical equipment used on motor vehicles. This includes all the different types of magnetos, of battery-ignition systems, of starting motors, generators and the accompanying current cut-outs, regulators, and other electrical accessories. In addition to training these specialists this department is giving to the general auto mechanics such training on electrical equipment as will enable him to perform such repairs and make such adjustments as are made by the expert general repairman.

5. The storage-battery department is giving training to men who at the completion of their courses, are to be specialists in storage-battery repair, qualified to be workmen or foremen in storage-battery service stations. In addition, this department is giving instruction to the general auto mechanics as outlined in paragraph 3.

6. The tire-repair department is at present giving instructions in tire repairing and vulcanizing to the general auto mechanics in order that they may be able to do such tube repair work and minor repairs on casings as are done in the ordinary garage by the general repairman. It is expected that in a short time there will be assigned a number of trainees who intend to make tire repair and vulcanizing their employment objective.

BAKING.

7. At present the trainees are engaged in baking bread in the bakery which supplies bread to the Army and the trainees' mess. As soon as they have become proficient in this, they will be given practice in baking various kinds of rolls and other breads. After having learned what they should know about the baking of breads and rolls, they will be given practice in the baking of pies, cakes, and pastries. The arrangement is ideal in that it furnishes a ready method of disposing of the entire product, and therefore the cost of materials for instruction becomes a negligible quantity. The training facilities are far superior to those available in the average bakery where placement training might be given.

CABINETMAKING.

8. In the cabinetmaking department the men are engaged in making various kinds of small pieces which bring in the various operations of the cabinetmaking trade. Several large pieces of furniture have been built for instruction in upholstery. Work has been started on a few pieces of furniture such as are found in the ordinary house. In a short time the cabinetmaking department will have completed an entire set of furniture such as is used in the home.

9. In a short time a very thorough instruction is to be given in the finishing of the various kinds of hardwoods. There will be a dust-proof finishing room provided with radiators to give the uniform heat necessary for proper setting and drying of varnish.

10. Many of the trainees have had experience prior to military service, or have had previous training in cabinetwork, and are qualified to do very good work.

CARPENTRY.

11. The carpentry trainees have been given practical instruction work on the erection of buildings and on changes in buildings about the school. They have been doing a considerable amount of what might be termed "mill work" on the woodworking machines of the carpenter shops. There is so much carpenter work to be done about the school that they have a chance to select as much as they desire of such work as the instructors believe is the best training for the men. It is planned that later they will erect some complete small bungalows for training in carpentry.

COOKING.

12. Instruction in cooking has been given by the chef and the cooks in the trainees' mess. The character of the food served and the variety, especially in view of the fact that they prepare very elaborate special meals on holidays and Sundays, is such that the training is very thorough. With such excellent facilities as are available for thorough instruction, and since the problem of disposal of the product gives no cause for worry, there being available at all times an adequate supply of raw material, it is hoped that there will soon be assigned a number of additional trainees.

ELECTRICAL DEPARTMENT.

13. At present electricians are receiving instructions to train them for two special employment objectives—wireman and motor and generator repairman, including armature rewinding and maintenance of power equipment. The employment objective for which a trainee was assigned in many cases has been subject to review by the vocational advisor and the chief instructor in the electrical department to insure training for the particular field of electrical work most feasible.

14. A considerable number of men has been assigned daily to the electrical department of the construction and repair section on work of installing wiring and machinery and making maintenance repairs throughout the reservation. This is most excellent training and is well liked by the men.

15. It is understood that an instructor has been employed and will report soon to give instruction in telegraphy. Since there should be courses available for a man who can not remain long on his feet, it is expected that this course will take care of an existing need.

16. As soon as the electrical equipment now in shipment from Camp Grant arrives, it is intended that equipment shall be set up for instruction in simple telephone work. One of the instructors already employed has had telephone experience. In fact, intercommunicating phones have been installed in four of the different shops of the schools.

LAUNDRY.

17. The facilities for instruction in laundry work are complete in every detail. The man in training works successively in each of the departments of a completely equipped, productive laundry, remaining in each department only long enough to become thoroughly competent to do and to direct work of that department.

18. The training will lead to the position of foreman of a department or to superintendent of a laundry. The men have taken a great interest in their work. The superintendent of the laundry, who has charge of the training, has informed the training officer that in three or four months one of the trainees will be qualified to be superintendent of a small laundry. As foremen and superintendents of laundries are sure of employment almost regardless of industrial conditions, it is unfortunate that there are not more men in training in this field.

MACHINIST.

19. The shop for instruction in the machinist trade is now being equipped with a complete line of machine tools, including lathes of various types, milling machines, shapers, drill presses, grinders, boring mills, planers, etc., and with hand and other tools necessary for bench work. This will be completely installed and fully equipped early in February.

PLUMBING AND STEAM FITTING.

20. The instruction in plumbing and steam fitting has been entirely on construction work. There has been an ideal variety of work in the installation of bathroom plumbing, such as bowls, toilets, tubs, showers, etc., and in the installation of steam radiators, both on low-pressure systems of the variety used in houses and on high-pressure systems where reducing valves and return traps are used.

21. The plumber trainees have installed all the washrooms and toilets in the various buildings used as shops in the training division and have done most creditable work. The men have taken great interest in their work.

22. Lead-working instruction will be started in about 30 days for men who have already become proficient in handling steam fitting and other plumbing work.

SHEET METAL.

23. The instruction in sheet-metal work has been of a varied nature, most of it being on production work required for maintenance or construction about the school. The instructor passes on each job offered him as to whether it is or is not satisfactory training before a job order is issued. This prevents production interfering with training.

24. The equipment has been sufficient for the various kinds of work which have been undertaken to date. Very complete equipment is expected from the sheet-metal department at Camp Grant. An acetylene welding torch is to be installed at once. The electrical school has built an electric arc welding outfit which will soon be in operation in the sheet-metal department.

25. A bench with the proper water tanks and acid tank for the test and repair of motor vehicle radiators is now under construction. This work has become important in many jobbing tin shops and sheet-metal shops. In many cities shops specialize on radiator repairing as their only line of work. The sheet-metal department will give instructions in automobile radiator repairing to men assigned from the auto mechanics departments in order that they may be able to do as much of such work as the general-repair man is likely to find necessary.

SHOE REPAIRING.

26. The very thorough instruction given in shoe repairing trains a man to do both handwork and any work done in the ordinary machine-equipped shoe-repair shop. The men who have had comparatively little experience have worked on Army shoes, of which there was an adequate supply available. It is intended that the trainees shall be allowed to bring their shoes to the shoe repair department for repairs, the charge made to be sufficient to reimburse the Government for materials used. This will give a much-desired variety of work on shoes of different styles and types.

27. Five men in training are now sufficiently proficient to make it safe to predict that 30 days' practice after a special type of stitcher now ordered has been set up will qualify them for rehabilitation. The machine differs from those with which the shop is now equipped in that it is better adapted to handling women's shoes and civilian shoes of the lighter type and having narrow welts.

SIGN PAINTING AND SHOW CARD WRITING.

28. The instruction in this department is laid out to train men to perform the various lines of work done in the ordinary "sign shop," which varies from plain simple lettering of small signs and cards to painting large signs such as are mounted in conspicuous places near highways and railroads. The man must have a large amount of practice in forming letters properly on the board or table before he can expect to do creditable work on larger signs, just as the musician or the typist must practice exercises and exercises to develop the skill of hand required.

29. As fast as the men become proficient they will work on large signs of wood, metal, and cloth such as are used so extensively in commercial advertising. Two of the more advanced men have rigged a painter's scaffold on the brick fire wall which forms the end of one of the large warehouses, have painted the brick surface and are lettering a large sign.

30. Equipment is adequate for the stage of advancement reached by the men. As they progress the necessary equipment is being provided. At no time has it been necessary for any trainee to sit around on account of lack of training facilities and equipment.

STATIONARY ENGINEERING.

31. The training in stationary engineering has been given in the refrigerating plant and in the boiler room of the laundry, pending the arrival of some steam engines which have been shipped. The men have secured some good training in tearing down and rebuilding the boiler-fed pumps in the laundry. It is intended that they shall undertake the job of overhauling the piping and fittings of one of the boilers in the laundry boiler room. This involves much of such work as the stationary steam engineer often has to perform or direct. As soon as the engines arrive they will be installed, connected up, run, and tested. They can then be torn down and assembled as often as desired.

for satisfactory training. In placement training the men learning in a power plant which must be kept running all the time do not have this opportunity to tear down and assemble engines which they will have here.

TAILORING.

32. The equipment and facilities for instruction in tailoring have been reported by the instructors in that department as 100 per cent complete. Many of the trainees have had some experience prior to the war or some previous training. Many of the men have bought their cloth with their own money and are making or have nearly finished suits for themselves. This is most desirable training in that it promotes the most sincere interest and pride in the work. The interest in this department is excellent.

TYPEWRITER REPAIRING.

33. Facilities for instruction in typewriter repairing are excellent. In that there are available at the present time eight or nine hundred typewriters of all makes and types in a condition varying from worn to unserviceable. The rebuilding of these machines is the best possible training and at the same time is providing serviceable machines which will be available for shipment to various offices of the Veterans' Bureau wherever needed.

34. Men who had taken little interest in some other line of work are taking great interest in this trade. It is a good trade for men who on account of the nature of their handicap can not do many other kinds of work.

UPHOLSTERY AND TRIMMING.

35. The work of the upholstering and trimming department is along two different lines, either or both of which may be taken by the trainees. The vehicle work consists of upholstering motor vehicles and building motor-vehicle tops of various types. The furniture work is laid out to train a man for work in furniture factories. Pieces of furniture have been built in the cabinet shop, and the men in the upholstery shop are building up the springs and doing the work necessary to turn out high-grade upholstered parlor suites.

RELATED EDUCATION.

36. The related education section is organized to support the trade and industrial section and the agricultural section by giving the trainees such basic education as is necessary for them in order that they may successfully pursue the vocations which have been selected as their employment objectives.

37. It is intended that the related education shall be not for the sake of academic instruction alone, but that it shall be specialized to meet the needs of the individual trainee with respect to the particular trade he intends to follow. Thus the mathematics given to a tradesman will be only what are needed for the special trade, and no more. If the trade requires no mathematics, none will be given. Drafting, sketching, and blue-print reading will be specialized to such extent that a man will be working on objects common to this trade.

PRODUCTIVE WORK.

38. Since January 1 all productive jobs scheduled through the various departments of the trade and industrial section have been covered by shop orders from the office of the superintendent of trade and industrial training. One copy of each such order is returned after the job is completed, with notations thereon to indicate all materials and all time charged to the job. The trainees in the department are to receive practice in figuring cost of jobs as a part of the training which will be necessary to qualify them for entering business for themselves or handling work for others.

INSTRUCTIONS SCHEDULES AND PROGRAMS.

39. Immediately after the opening of the training each instructor prepared under direction a complete "trade analysis" of his trade and submitted it to the training officer. This trade analysis indicated, first, all the manipulative operations which a skilled or master workman at the trade should be able to perform; second, the trade mathematics required for satisfactory performance of the operations; third, the necessary fundamental, scientific, or technical knowledge necessary; fourth, the trade drafting and sketching which applies to the trade, if any.

40. The related technical training has been given in connection with the jobs in the shops to some extent, and efforts are being made to secure the closest possible cooperation between the instructors who teach the trade and those who teach the related subjects in order that the work may be as closely parallel as possible.

41. The character of the training in any of the trades given is such that men who have different ability to progress or have different previous training are allowed to make individual rates of advancement. Where group work is necessary men of nearly equal progress and ability are allowed to progress in the manipulative work of their trade more rapidly than the less fit. The same custom which is universal in nature and in business is as natural and as desirable in vocational training.

UNITED STATES VETERANS' BUREAU, VOCATIONAL SCHOOL No. 1, Chillicothe, Ohio, January 30, 1922.

AGRICULTURAL TRAINING SECTION—INFORMATION REGARDING COURSES.

1. The following is a brief discussion of the character of the instruction and of the aims of the different courses offered in the agricultural training section.

2. The plans for the opening of the agricultural section of the vocational school at Chillicothe are practically completed. Six instructors and four assistants have been secured and are at the institution ready for the opening February 1. Arrangements are completed for the accommodation of 50 students for the beginning of the agricultural training, and by such arrangements the trainees will have housing and boarding accommodations equal to those supplied the trainees in the trades and industrial section. Classrooms are in readiness for the instruction, and, although not the permanent classrooms with laboratory connections, they will enable very complete and satisfactory instruction of the theoretical nature necessary in elementary introduction into the various lines of agriculture composing the main objectives of the trainees.

AGRICULTURAL BUILDINGS.

3. A very desirable and satisfactory group of buildings, formerly used by the E. and R., are, saving the necessary modifications, to supply ideal quarters for the various departments of agricultural training and will include the necessary rooms and unit libraries in connection with classrooms and laboratories for the proper handling of such subjects as horticulture, covering gardening, small fruits, orcharding, poultry and swine husbandry (later, general animal and dairy husbandry), farm mechanics, and bee culture.

try and swine husbandry (later, general animal and dairy husbandry), farm mechanics, and bee culture.

4. As the work develops and the growing season approaches, arrangements will have been completed for landscape gardening, floriculture, and forestry.

5. Referring in detail to some of the subjects mentioned in which the trainees will specialize, attention should be called to the exceptional opportunity presented by the numerous one-story buildings which, with slight modifications, will provide greenhouses, plant-propagating houses, vegetable forcing, cottages for student villages, poultry houses, etc. The modifications of these buildings will be brought about by the student labor in instruction, since poultrymen construct their own buildings.

6. For dairy husbandry and dairy manufacture the institution has inherited from the E. and R. equipment for the creamery for butter making, cheese and ice-cream manufacture and instruction in general cream and milk pasteurization, bottling, and marketing. The institution also has the advantage of the floor of one barn properly concreted for the stalls and stanchions to accommodate a unit of 20 cows ready for installation. We have in hand, left by the E. and R., the necessary stalls and stanchions for this barn, also the dairy machinery ready for installation on the concrete floor already prepared for the purpose. As the development proceeds, it is planned to establish at least 3 additional dairy barns, 2 for units of 20 cows each and the other for 40 cows. Most excellent farm lands for the production of corn for silage for the most ideal rations for dairy cows and the production of grain and hay are in splendid arable condition.

7. The implements, machinery, and tools, with many other supplies, are in hand for almost complete complements for the satisfactory operation of said farms. These will be overhauled and placed in proper condition by the farm mechanic unit, two instructors of which constitute a part of the faculty and are here for the purpose of giving instruction and incidentally placing the four tractors, farm implements, and machinery on hand in prime condition.

8. The farm lands of Camp Sherman have been alluded to and should be referred to more in detail. That part of the splendid area of about 5,000 acres constituting the camp proper and extending in three directions beyond the camp buildings is of the richest Scioto Valley land most suitable for corn and other valuable grain crops, gardening, and small fruits. The blocks from which the buildings are being and have been removed will be handled as the garden group. They consist of 2½ acres each within the road border and present an exceptional opportunity for practical project training on the part of the students carefully supervised by the instructors, who have been selected with careful consideration as to their ability to prepare and give instruction in project training and at the same time with such experience in teaching as to enable them to give the students the most complete instruction in the related subjects.

9. Referring further to agricultural group of buildings, it is proper to state that with a reasonable outlay in necessary modifications they can be made to serve a real and most desirable purpose as an ideal school at applied agriculture. These buildings have been gone over very carefully by experts, including two men selected by the Secretary of Agriculture from the United States Department of Agriculture, a gentleman selected from the Ohio Agricultural College (a part of the Ohio State University of Columbus), and a training officer of agricultural education from the central office of the United States Veterans' Bureau who has been at the head of agricultural training in rehabilitation for the last three years. These men were a unit in their judgment that the opportunities presented at Camp Sherman were most exceptional for the training of disabled soldiers of elementary grade. In their study suitable buildings were designated on the plats to be retained in this group for farm mechanics to cover shop work, forge work, farm carpentry, and automotive power, horticultural lines mentioned, poultry, agronomy, including elementary soil physics, chemistry, and classrooms for the teaching of English and mathematics vocationally from the standpoint of agricultural subjects.

10. It is germane to state that this committee of agricultural experts recommend that the practical work in all these agricultural lines be carried fully 50-50 with the scientific instruction and that the schedules be prepared to cover all related subjects that would strengthen the trainee in his objective. In other words, that the objective be considered as a major and that such minors be added to the schedule of each student as would strengthen that major and enable the trainee to diversify the knowledge and training secured, in order that he might efficiently carry on in other lines independently or associated with his specialty. This is in conformity with the plans and courses of study in the subcollegiate, one and two year courses of the State agricultural colleges of the country and with the objectives recommended and already followed by the training section of the Rehabilitation Division of the Veterans' Bureau. To illustrate, combination objectives have been offered for the trainee as a prospective small farmer. The first of such combinations grew out of the suggestion from the Pacific coast—California, Oregon, and Washington coming to us as "poultry, fruit, and bees." The modification was then adopted for horticulture—gardening, small fruits, orcharding—poultry, bees, etc. With these diversifications, intensified upon, the trainee on his practical little farm is quite fully assured of success and the establishment of a paying and profitable farm home, in which his entire family is interested and helpful. No line of training has ever appealed to the trainees more strongly than such combinations. Another assurance of the success of the trainee is, namely, farm mechanics and farm management. Positions are awaiting everywhere for such trained men to enable the proper and efficient use of improved farm machinery and implements with automotive power on the farm.

11. All schedules have been worked out and are in readiness for the beginning, February 1. The instructors are on the ground, have held their conferences, and are ready and enthusiastic, full of sympathy for the undertaking and proper development of the 50 students to begin their agricultural courses.

12. It is believed that 50 students can be taken care of at the beginning of March and April and that thereafter the increase can be much more rapid to complete accommodation of the buildings selected for the agricultural training.

CAMP SHERMAN.

After war was declared the Government purchased 5,000 acres of land, constituting Camp Sherman proper, and has a title in fee simple for the same. The Government has expended approximately $19,000,000 in the purchase, construction, and equipment of this camp. The camp is located in Ross County, Ohio, the fourth State of the Union in population, near the center of population of the United States, in close proximity to the coal fields; on two main trunk lines, the Norfolk & Western and the Baltimore & Ohio Railroads, the former running north and south and the latter running east and west, both of which are connected with the seacoast and with all the great industrial centers.

Camp Sherman is located in the very heart of a great agricultural community. Fuel and food supplies can be had at a minimum cost. Chillicothe, adjacent to the camp, has a population of about 17,000. It is a thriving, progressive city. It has the largest canning factory in the world. Its business men are thrifty and progressive. Food supplies of every description can be obtained in this city for the students at a reasonable cost. The camp farm is one of the finest farms in the country. The soil is of the best quality and highly productive. The scenery surrounding the camp is beautiful, and the climate is delightful. This camp has at all times ranked as one of the three highest in the United States from a point of health and sanitation. The camp has one of the best equipped hospitals of any of the camps in the United States, having a bed capacity of 2,000, with all modern facilities, and this is in line with the provisions of what is known as the "Sweet bill," which gives the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau the right to utilize all existing facilities in the War Department.

Both the disabled soldiers and their friends and relatives can reach this camp from any quarter of the country at a minimum cost to themselves and the Government.

The same spot upon which the Vocational School No. 1 is located has been used as a site for the training of soldiers in four different wars in which the United States has been involved.

THE UNITED STATES VETERANS' BUREAU.

Gentlemen of the House, if you will permit me, I want to say right here that Gen. Forbes, Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau, in my judgment, has rendered a most valuable service to the veterans of the late World War and to the country. He has been subjected to severe criticism which he did not deserve. To my mind he has proven beyond doubt his ability to handle one of the biggest jobs in the country. He has a tremendous responsibility, but he has discharged his official duties faithfully and well, and is entitled to the highest commendation of those seeking relief for veterans of the World War. His task has not been an easy one, but difficult, indeed. [Applause.]

Many of the delays in awarding compensation and vocational training are not due to any fault of his, but due to the fact that many of the claims presented were not supported by sufficient evidence to warrant their allowance. I hold no brief for Col. Forbes, but I do believe in giving every man due credit for what he does. I have a statement here which he recently submitted that I want to incorporate as a part of this address for the information of the Members of the House and the people of the United States.

THE UNITED STATES VETERANS' BUREAU IS—

1. Paying out over $1,000,000 in cash every day, including Sunday, directly into the hands of the ex-service man or his dependents.
2. Providing, without cost, hospital care and treatment to 30,000 veterans. This care includes board and lodging and represents an expenditure by the Government of $60,000,000 per annum.
3. Giving vocational training, without cost, to over 100,000 disabled ex-service men at an expenditure for tuition and supervision of $30,000,000 per annum.
4. Mailing out 650,000 checks every month, representing $42,000,000.
5. Conducting an insurance business for over 600,000 ex-service men without any cost of administration to them. Insurance in force: Three and one-half billions.
6. Conducting over 50,000 medical examinations every month.
7. Giving outside treatment in cases where hospitalization is not required to 20,000 ex-service men every month.
8. Receiving 1,000 new claims every day, in addition to the 1,200,000 already on file; employing 4,000 ex-service men and women in carrying out the work.
9. Requiring for 1922 expenditures in behalf of the disabled ex-service man $510,000,000—more than the entire expenditure of the whole United States in 1897.
10. The United States of America is already doing more for its disabled veterans than any country in the world, despite the fact that their losses were far heavier than ours.
11. Do these facts indicate that the disabled ex-service man is being neglected?

I have a few photographs here which were taken at the training school at my instance and request, and I want to submit them for your consideration. These photographs will give you some idea of the work that is being done at Camp Sherman, notwithstanding the fact that this school has been in operation only a little more than two months.

Gentlemen of the House, I have submitted the above facts for the information of the membership of this House, as I am led to believe that the Senate has already reinstated this appropriation. In the event that it does, then, of course, the House will have an opportunity to vote on the same.

I know that it has been the policy of this administration to adopt economy wherever possible and to lessen the burden of taxation as much as possible. I am one of the Members of this House who has voted for every economy that was submitted to the House, and I would not support this appropriation if I was not convinced that it is highly proper and essential to the welfare of the disabled soldiers. We can not afford, gentlemen, to economize at the expense of the disabled soldiers of this country. They deserve our support and any appropriation that will tend to relieve their condition. We owe it to them to do all within our power to help them. [Applause.]

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the Record.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums are appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the Departments of Commerce and Labor for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, namely:

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10559) making appropriations for the Departments of Commerce and Labor for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted—

To Mr. LANKFORD (at the request of Mr. LARSEN of Georgia), on account of illness.

To Mr. ROGERS (at the request of Mr. WALSH), on account of illness of his mother.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 48 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Friday, February 24, 1922, at 12 o'clock noon.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I was requested to announce the absence of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], who are detained at a hearing before the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). Sixty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

SENATOR FROM IOWA.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I present the resignation of my colleague [Mr. KENYON] as a Senator from the State of Iowa, which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The reading clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., February 24, 1922.

To the Hon. CALVIN COOLIDGE,
Vice President of the United States and President of the Senate.

SIR: I hereby tender my resignation as a United States Senator from the State of Iowa for the term expiring March 3, 1925, to take effect immediately.

Respectfully submitted.

WILLIAM S. KENYON.

Mr. CUMMINS. I present the certificate of appointment of Mr. CHARLES A. RAWSON as a Senator from the State of Iowa to succeed my former colleague.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The credentials will be read.

The credentials were read and ordered to be filed, as follows:

STATE OF IOWA,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.

To all to whom these presents shall come—Greeting:

Whereas Charles A. Rawson, of the county of Polk, has been appointed to the office of Senator in the Congress of the United States to represent the State of Iowa in the Senate of the United States until the vacancy therein caused by the resignation of Hon. William S. Kenyon, effective February 24, 1922, is filled by election as provided by law:

Therefore, know ye, that in pursuance of law, I, N. E. Kendall, governor of the State of Iowa, in the name and by the authority of the people of the State, do hereby commission the said Charles A. Rawson to such office, with full power and authority to execute and perform the duties thereof according to law, and to enjoy all the rights, authorities, privileges, and emoluments thereto legally appertaining for the period until a successor is elected and qualified, the commission taking effect on the 25th day of February, A. D. 1922.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused to be affixed the great seal of the State of Iowa.

Done at the capitol, in the city of Des Moines, this 21st day of February, in the year of our Lord 1922.

[SEAL.]

By the governor:

N. E. KENDALL, Governor.

W. C. RAMSAY, Secretary of State.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. RAWSON is present and ready to take the oath of office. I ask that it now be administered to him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator appointed will come forward and take the oath of office.

Mr. RAWSON, escorted by Mr. CUMMINS, advanced to the Vice President's desk, and the oath prescribed by law having been administered to him, he took his seat in the Senate.

PETITIONS.

Mr. LADD presented a resolution adopted by the Senate of the State of Maryland, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, as follows:

A resolution recommending the stabilization of sundry basic farm products.

Whereas the basic industry of agriculture is now in the depths of the greatest depression in the history of the Republic, in which over 40,000,000 of our farm population have lost their purchasing power; and

Whereas the loss of this purchasing power is reflected on the paved streets of our great cities, where more than 5,000,000 jobless, helpless, breadless workmen tramp the highways seeking work that can not be found; and

Whereas the helpless farmer can not help the helpless industrial worker on account of his own helplessness and lack of organization; and

Whereas the National Government insisted on a price guaranty and stabilization of markets for farm products during the late World War, when the farmers did not need and did not want it; and

Whereas the time has now come when they do need it and do want it, not only for their own welfare but for the welfare of the entire Nation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of Maryland in session assembled on this 14th of February, A. D. 1922:

First. That we recommend and urge upon the President of the United States, the Senators and Representatives of the State of Maryland in Washington, that they quickly cooperate, unite, pass, and approve a bill for the immediate stabilization of at least three of the basic products of the farm for enough, at least, to pay the cost of production, but not exceeding wheat at $2 per bushel, corn at $1 per bushel, and wool at 60 cents per pound, all of which command the power of precedent in that the United States Government has already decided it to be right, proper, and legal to stabilize and did stabilize by the guaranty of a minimum price these products of the farm at a time when neither the country nor the farmer needed such stabilization. How much more necessary, therefore, is it now to stabilize these products in order that prosperity may return, not only to the fields and furrows of the farms but that, with renewed purchasing power, the farmer may start again the wheels of industry and provide jobs for the jobless, help for the helpless, and bread for the breadless.

Second. That the United States Grain Corporation be revived with a fair and friendly board of directors and provided with one-half the capital that was heretofore used to exploit and plunder the farmer, who was more interested in winning the World War than in the winning of a competence against the day of misfortune, which has now arrived.

Third. That a copy of this resolution be mailed by the secretary of the senate to the President of the United States, to the Maryland Senators and Representatives, and to the members of the agricultural bloc in Washington, that they may be encouraged to continue the work for the farmer which they have thus far so nobly carried on.

Which was read and adopted by yeas and nays, as follows:

Yeas 21, nays 4.
February 14, 1922.

E. R. CROTHERS,
Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. LADD presented a resolution adopted by the Commercial Club of Wahpeton, N. Dak., favoring the enactment of legislation for improvement of the St. Lawrence River so as to admit ocean-going vessels to the Great Lakes, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petitions of I. B. Klein and 49 others, of Rhame and vicinity; Carl Aamodt and 66 others, of Overly and vicinity; and H. O. Gulbranson and 52 others, of Colgan and vicinity, all in the State of North Dakota, praying for the enactment of legislation reviving the Government Grain Corporation so as to stabilize prices of certain farm products, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BURSUM, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 4) granting relief to soldiers and sailors of the War with Spain, Philippine insurrection, and Chinese Boxer rebellion campaign; to widows, former widows, and dependent parents of such soldiers and sailors; and to certain Army nurses, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 512) thereon.

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2992) authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish certain information for historical purposes to the adjutants general of the several States and the District of Columbia, and making an appropriation therefor, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 513) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. ELKINS:

A bill (S. 3193) to provide for the refund of penalties paid under section 4 of the food control act, as amended; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. HARRIS:

A bill (S. 3194) granting a pension to John R. Robertson; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. PHIPPS:

A bill (S. 3195) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to accept completion of Carey segregation No. 11 and to issue patent therefor; to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.

By Mr. McNARY:

A bill (S. 3196) to encourage the development of the agricultural resources of the United States through Federal and State cooperation, giving preference in the matter of employment and the establishment of rural homes to those who have served with the military and naval forces of the United States; to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.

AMENDMENT OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CALDER submitted an amendment proposing an extension of Rittenhouse Street from the Metropolitan Branch of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. intended to be proposed by him to House bill 10101, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

WORLD WAR FOREIGN DEBT COMMISSION.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I ask that Senate resolution 244 be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution, which will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Senate resolution 244, by Mr. WALSH of Montana, directing the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire as to the eligibility of Hon. REED SMOOT and Hon. THEODORE E. BURTON to membership on the Commission to Refund Obligations of Foreign Governments to the United States.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. CALDER. I have asked the Senator from Montana to yield to me in order that I may report favorably two resolutions from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and ask unanimous consent for their present consideration.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, we are unable to hear what is going on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

THE MUSCLE SHOALS PLANT.

Mr. CALDER. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate I report favorably with an amendment Senate resolution 238, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution reported by the Senator from New York will be read.

The reading clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 238), which had been submitted by Mr. NORRIS on the 16th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry or any subcommittee thereof be, and they are hereby, authorized to go to Muscle Shoals, Ala., for the purpose of taking evidence and making investigation regarding the advisability of the completion of the Government improvement for power purposes at that place, either by the Government itself or by some lessee. There is hereby appropriated out of the contingent fund of the Senate the sum of $1,000 for the payment of the expenses of said investigation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The amendment reported by the committee was, on page 1, to strike out, "There is hereby appropriated out of the contingent fund of the Senate the sum of $1,000 for the payment of the expenses of said investigation," and to insert "and to employ a stenographer at a cost not exceeding $1.25 per printed page, the expenses of said investigation to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and not to exceed $1,000."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield for a moment?

Mr. CALDER. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. There are some Senators who are very much interested in the proposition which is involved in the resolution who are not, however, members of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. Would the Senator object to inserting after the word "thereof" the words "or any other Member of the Senate," in order that other Senators who may be particularly interested in this matter may also be authorized to go to Muscle Shoals with the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry?

Mr. CALDER. Speaking for myself, I should have no objection to such an amendment as the Senator suggests, provided that the expense incurred shall not exceed the thousand dollars, which is the limit fixed in the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi offer the amendment which he has suggested?

Mr. HARRISON. I offer that amendment.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. CALDER. I yield.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I should like to know why the limitation of $1,000 is proposed to be placed upon this expenditure. This matter involves one of the most important questions with which the Senate will have to deal, relating, as it does, to the utilization of the plant and improvements at Muscle Shoals. It seems to me a little unusual to place such a small limitation upon the expenditures of a committee which is to investigate so very important a matter. Why was the expenditure limited to only $1,000?

Mr. CALDER. The $1,000 limitation was put upon the expenditure by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] in the original resolution, and the committee authorized me to report the resolution with that limitation.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I think that that limitation is really too small. I have been impressed with the fact that the proposal made by Mr. Ford is one of great merit; that Congress should take advantage of his offer; and that this plant should in this way be utilized for the benefit of the agricultural interests of our country. I should very much dislike for the expenditure to be so limited that the committee would be hampered in making a proper investigation. Of course, however, if this sum is all which may be agreed upon by the committee, we shall probably have to accept it. It is my opinion that the appropriation should be two or three times the amount fixed in the resolution. I think Mr. Ford's proposition should be acted upon favorably and I do not desire to see anything happen to retard prompt action on his proposal.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I have listened attentively to what the Senator from Florida has said. Of course I think if this proposed investigation is made it ought to be made in the proper manner. I am very much in favor of the investigation, because I think it will throw light on the question involved. There is a vast sum of money involved, besides other problems. I think if the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and such other Senators as may desire to go shall go to the ground it will not be necessary for them to stay a great while in order to see the immense plant which has been built by the Government, the power dam, and the partially completed construction work, and to understand the potential possibilities, and that it will be of great aid to the Senate in reaching a final conclusion as to the disposition of the matter.

We spend sometimes by direction of the Senate up to ten or fifteen or twenty thousand dollars investigating theories. I do not want to expend in this case a sum which is unnecessary. I can readily see how the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry may not have been able carefully to calculate what the investigation will cost. However, as I travel that route very often, I know that the actual railway fare down there and back is something like $60; the Pullman car fare will be at least $15 more; then there will be hotel bills and other incidental expenses, so that $1,000 would not be sufficient to take more than 10 Senators down there and back.

Mr. CALDER. The sum of $1,000 is all for which the resolution as originally introduced by the Senator from Nebraska asks, I will say to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I realize that, but I fear that the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry did not measure the situation. Of course, the resolution is subject to amendment. I do not desire to interfere with the proposal of the chairman of the committee, but I hope he will not object if I move to make the sum $2,000 instead of $1,000.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from Alabama that the resolution should merely provide, as such resolutions ordinarily provide, that the expenditure shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate? Of course the committee would use all necessary precautions about the expenditures, but to limit them to a definite amount I think would be unwise.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I was proceeding on the basis that a committee consisting of 12 or 15 Senators can go down there and make the investigation and come back within the limit of $2,000, but it is proposed by the resolution to confine the expenditures to $1,000.

Mr. SMITH. I am quite sure that what the Senator from Alabama states as to that is true. As a member of an investigating committee I have just returned, and I am sure that I have held everything down to the lowest possible amount, but it approximated $100 of expenditure for each Senator in almost the identical neighborhood involved in this resolution. As the Senator from Alabama has already remarked, merely the car fare and traveling expenses will be practically $100 for each Senator.

Mr. HEFLIN. Not only that, if my colleague will permit me, but the resolution provides for stenographic services; so if the committee should desire to take testimony on the ground, that work would have to be paid for; and $1,000 would not begin to pay the expenses, as my colleague, the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], says for the committee merely to go down there and back, not including other expenses.

Mr. LODGE. I will ask the senior Senator from Alabama what limit to the expenditure he has suggested?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have suggested to increase the sum provided for by the resolution from $1,000 to $2,000.

Mr. CALDER. I have no objection at all to that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think that amount will cover the necessary expenditures.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think $2,000 will be ample to provide for all Senators who may desire to go.

Mr. LODGE. I think there should be a limit to the expenditure.

Mr. McKELLAR. I also think so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think I ought to say a few words on this question. In submitting the original resolution I was acting under instructions given me by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. The resolution, therefore, came from the committee. The subject was considered in the committee. It was at first thought by me that a subcommittee of the full committee would be sent down to Muscle Shoals to investigate, but in the discussion it developed that many members of the committee were deeply interested in the project, and felt so keenly the responsibility placed upon them by the Senate in connection with the investigation that they wanted to go. So the feeling was that a very large number of the committee would want to go down and make the investigation. That was perfectly natural, I think. I believe it must be conceded that those who are to investigate and report on the Muscle Shoals project ought to examine it on the ground if they are to make a full investigation. I was instructed, therefore, to report the resolution to the Senate, which I did.

I have no objection whatever to any other Member of the Senate visiting Muscle Shoals, and of course I have no objection to the Senate providing that any Senator may go down there who desires to do so. I do not want to be understood as in any way objecting to the amendment suggested by the Senator from Mississippi. It is a very appropriate suggestion, it seems to me; but I think if the resolution is amended, as is proper and right, so as to provide that any other Member of the Senate who desires to do so may go down there, the resolution ought to be further amended so as to put the matter in the hands of the Sergeant at Arms and let him take charge of it.

It is not a committee matter any further, and the Sergeant at Arms, it seems to me, or some other designated officer—I think he is usually the officer to make such arrangements—should have charge of it. He is equipped with the necessary clerical force and employees who have had experience in matters of this kind, so that he could, after consultation or communication with Senators, ascertain how many desire to go, and then secure the necessary accommodations, not only upon the train but whatever hotel reservations may be necessary down there. The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry through its chairman is not equipped to make such arrangements.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, what the Senator proposes is the practice. All he has to do is to ask the Sergeant at Arms, and he will take complete charge of the matter for him.

Mr. NORRIS. If an amendment making provision for the Sergeant at Arms to take charge of the matter is not necessary and if he can do that in any event, that is perfectly satisfactory to me, of course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi, which will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. In line 1, after the word "thereof," it is proposed to insert "or any other Member of the Senate."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALDER. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], I understand, suggested an amendment to strike out "$1,000" and insert "$2,000."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; I move to amend the resolution further by striking out "$1,000" and inserting "$2,000."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before the amendment may be considered it will be necessary to reconsider the vote by which the amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, as I understand, the Senate has already adopted the committee amendment fixing the limit of expenditure at $1,000.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then, I ask unanimous consent that the vote may be reconsidered by which the committee amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the vote whereby the committee amendment was agreed to is reconsidered.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I now offer the amendment to strike out "$1,000" and insert "$2,000."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the last line of the resolution it is proposed to strike out "$1,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$2,000."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

NETTIE B. ROSS.

Mr. CALDER. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate I report back favorably without amendment the resolution S. Res. 239, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask what is the purport of the resolution?

Mr. CALDER. It is a resolution to pay a sum equal to six months' salary to the widow of a laborer in the employ of the Senate, who recently died.

Mr. OVERMAN. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution, which was submitted by Mr. LODGE on the 16th instant, was considered and agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate to Nettie B. Ross, widow of James D. Ross, late a laborer in the employ of the Senate, a sum equal to six months' compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

WORLD WAR FOREIGN DEBT COMMISSION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Senate resolution 244, submitted by Mr. WALSH of Montana yesterday, directing the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire as to the eligibility of Hon. REED SMOOT and Hon. THEODORE E. BURTON to membership on the Commission to Refund Obligations of Foreign Governments to the United States.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, a day or two ago, in speaking of the appointment of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] on the World War Foreign Debt Commission, I quoted from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of July 11, 1921, as to the position of the Senator from Utah in reference to the collection of our foreign debt and the interest thereon. I quoted only a small portion of his statement, but, in justice to the Senator from Utah, I desire to have printed in the RECORD at this point his entire statement, as it appears on pages 3533 and 3534 of the RECORD of July 11, 1921.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, will the Senator read it? I should like to hear what it is.

Mr. McKELLAR. It embraces a whole page of the RECORD.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Then I will not ask that it be read.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have talked to the Senator from Utah in regard to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. SMOOT. I am one who has given a great deal of thought and attention to this subject. With me it is not a question of whether we can collect the money. Of course we can force the money out of England. Of course we can make France pay. Of course we can make some of the other countries pay. The question with me is whether it is for the best interests of the United States to do it. I say to the Senator without a moment's hesitation that it would be the very worst thing in the world for the United States to take that position.

I have not the time now, but I am going to take about an hour's time of the Senate within a very short time and I think I can convince the Senate that if that policy were to be pursued it would be the absolute ruin of the foreign commerce of the United States.

The Senator must know, because he has already referred to the question of the reparations being paid by Germany, that those reparations were paid and the small transfer made in foreign exchange to the United States caused the pound sterling to drop 30 cents within 10 days. If the money that is owing by way of interest was paid to the United States to-day, if it could be paid by all the countries of the world, we would see the French franc drop 50 per cent, we would see the pound sterling drop, not 30 cents but at least $1 and perhaps more, and we would be left high and dry as far as reaching any of the markets of the world is concerned until the situation through credits from other countries, and that would take years of time, would drop back to a normal condition, so we could exchange the goods of foreign countries, and I mean exchange the goods by being in a position to exchange our credits that we may be owing one nation to another nation that was owing us. It is a law of commerce, and when it is violated commerce answers, just as in the violation of a law of health the individual has to answer. It is so plain to me that it seems every one ought to see it.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah a question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield later to the Senator from Indiana to answer the Senator from Utah.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I did not wish to answer the Senator from Utah. I desired to ask him a question.

Mr. NORRIS. I think that while what the Senator from Utah has said is fresh in my mind I ought to make what comments I have to make upon his remarks. If the Senator from Utah would apply his logic individually, I should like to owe him some money. I should like to borrow all the money I could get from him and not pay the interest until it ran up to such a large sum that he would refuse to accept it. If I only owed him a little, I suppose he would take it, but if I did not pay it for several years and it accumulated into a large amount I presume he would forgive the debt.

Mr. SMOOT. The only difference between the Senator from Utah and the foreign country is that the Senator from Utah can not begin issuing paper money and compelling the people of the country to take it. No country can compel the people to take it at a certain figure, because it is only worth what it will sell for in a foreign land in the purchase of foreign commodities.

Mr. NORRIS. No one disputes that.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator from Utah had the right to issue paper money and compel the Senator from Nebraska to take it, or if the Senator from Nebraska could issue paper money and compel the Senator from Utah to take it with no security other than the promise to pay of either man, then the situation would be quite different. Neither the Senator from Nebraska nor the Senator from Utah can do that, but the Government can do it.

What is the matter with the Government of Poland to-day? The printing press. Germany, with her mark down to 1.3—what is the matter? The printing press. When she owes a debt to a foreign country the printing press does not count. It is what that money that is issued from the printing press will bring in gold as the standard that counts.

In my opinion Germany is in a better position than any country in all the world to-day to get out from under the bondage that has been placed upon her by the war. I say that with the understanding that she will pay every dollar of the obligations that have been placed upon her through the Versailles treaty. She stands in a better position to-day to be out and free from her bonded indebtedness than almost any other country in the world.

Mr. NORRIS. I wonder if I may talk a while?

Mr. SMOOT. I beg the Senator's pardon. I shall not bother the Senator again.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator's statement about the Government issuing paper money and compelling some one to take it does not apply. It has nothing to do with the case. No Government can compel us to take their paper or any other Government to take their paper. It is not a question of taking any depleted currency here, but the Senator's own argument is to the effect that this has gone on so long that there is such a vast amount of money due us now that if we require payment it will do us much more injury than it will do to the people who pay it. His statement that Germany is better off than other countries may be true in one sense, because Germany, by the defeat she has suffered, is not allowed to build up an army and a navy, and her energies will be directed toward other activities.

If the balance of the world continue to spend all their energy, all their money, and all their resources in building up armies and in building up navies, the time will come when the statement of the Senator from Utah will prove to be true. But if his logic is right, then we made an awful mistake in winning the war. We ought to have been defeated. We ought to be the country that owes instead of the creditor nation. In order to save ourselves we ought to get in debt some more and give some more money to the nations of Europe and then say that we will never let them pay it; that we should get into debt ourselves and borrow all the money we can to pay the interest, tax our people to pay it, and then say, "We are going to owe it to you, and then we are not going to let you pay it because whenever you pay it you will ruin us, you will hurt us."

It is an awful thing. If we were demanding now of England and France and Italy and the other countries the payment to-morrow of all the money that they owe us, it would be an entirely different proposition. We know they could not pay it. It would be an impossibility. It would not be right to ask that. I would not be in favor of it. But every day that we put it off we make it possible for men to make the argument that is made here to-day by the Senator from Utah, that it is too much, they can not pay it, that it is getting bigger every day, and it is going up by the thousands of dollars every hour.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator does not mean to intimate that I think these obligations ought to be forgiven these countries, does he?

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no; I have not said that. I do not know what the Senator thinks about it.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator had allowed me to continue just a moment, I would have stated that, in my opinion, just as soon as the peoples of the world get back to work and get to producing, then there is no question that the exchanges can be adjusted; and not only would I demand that all the interest be paid but I would demand part of the obligation, and they could pay it then. But as long as the world is in the shape that it is in to-day I would say to the Senator it is a commercial impossibility.

I do not wish the country or the Senator or the Senate to think for a moment that I have the least idea of forgiving these countries either the principal or the interest. Every dollar of both ought to be paid, in my opinion.

Mr. NORRIS. When ought they to commence?

Mr. SMOOT. Just as soon as the countries get in a position whereby they can get to work. The country that is nearest that point to-day is Germany, as I said before. I do not know how long they will take.

Mr. NORRIS. Suppose Germany pays England, as she has paid her something recently; suppose Germany pays England $5,000,000 to-day and England wanted to pay that same $5,000,000 to us to-morrow, to be applied on what she owes us, would the Senator from Utah reject it?

Mr. SMOOT. Not at all.

Mr. NORRIS. He would take it, would he?

Mr. SMOOT. That is quite a different proposition from collecting all the interest. There is nearly a billion dollars of interest, and $5,000,000 would be quite a different proposition from $1,000,000,000.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I would rather have $1,000,000,000 than $5,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. I may say this to the Senator from Nebraska: Whatever payment can be made should be made and we should collect all we can up to the point that it will not interfere with the exchanges of the world so as to place our country at a disadvantage.

Mr. NORRIS. Where will that point be, in the Senator's judgment? How much could we collect to-day if England were willing to pay it? Would it hurt us to take $100,000,000 to-day?

Mr. SMOOT. That would depend upon the ability of England to pay so that it would not interfere with her exchange.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, it will aid in appraising the value of the discussion which I have been presenting to the Senate if I state the conditions giving rise to the report of Speaker Henderson, to which I have referred.

Mr. LODGE. May I ask the Senator if his resolution has been laid before the Senate?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It has. On July 13, 1898, President McKinley appointed Senator Cullom, Senator Morgan, Representative Hitt, and Messrs. Dole and Frear as commissioners to recommend legislation concerning the Hawaiian Islands under the joint resolution of July 7, 1898. The matter of the eligibility of Senators Cullom and Morgan and Representative Hitt to serve upon this commission was, by resolution of the Senate, referred for consideration to the Judiciary Committee of the Senate. In that situation of affairs the House also took note of the question, and the report of Mr. Henderson which I have been reading was submitted to the House in support of his contention that there was no constitutional objection to the appointment of Members of Congress upon that commission.

No report was made from the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, as I stated on yesterday, or at least no record of any report can be found. It is recorded, however, that Senator Hoar, upon whose motion the reference was made, made a very able and exhaustive speech contending that the gentlemen named, being Members of one or the other House of Congress, were ineligible. The speech evidently made a very deep impression upon his colleagues. As I say, there is no record that a report from the Judiciary Committee was ever made, and it is not clear from the RECORD as to whether this address of Senator Hoar was delivered in the Senate in executive session or before the Judiciary Committee; but a very careful search of the RECORD has not revealed the speech. However, the Senate refused to confirm these nominations, and the inference is irresistible that they were persuaded by the discussion which took place. Speaker Henderson, however, took the other view; and the discussion to which I am now directing the attention of the Senate is, I take it, as strong an argument as could be made upon the other side. The Speaker here points out that inasmuch as the members of this commission had no duties to perform except to investigate and report to the Congress, without any power to carry out any law or to enact any law or to construe any law, they were not officers within the meaning of the Constitution.

I discontinued last night at that part of the report which referred to the decision of the Supreme Court of the State of Wisconsin holding that commissioners appointed to make a geological, mineralogical, and agricultural survey of the State of Wisconsin are officers within the meaning of an analogous provision of the constitution of the State of Wisconsin. The opinion says:

The geological survey commissioners were appointed directly by the legislature; no specific term of office was fixed (except by the governor, whose power to do so may well be doubted); provision was made by law for removing them for cause and for filling vacancies; their salaries were paid out of the State treasury, and their functions were not of merely private, local, or temporary concern, but related to the material and permanent interests of the whole State. The duty imposed upon them was an important public trust, to be exercised for the benefit of all the people of the State, and could only be discharged properly by gentlemen of high attainments in physical science. * * * It may safely be asserted that any person charged by law with the performance of public functions affecting the general interests of society, especially if he be elected thereto by the people or appointed directly by the legislature, and who receives his compensation out of the public treasury, is a public officer, and as such can have no vested right in his office, unless secured by the constitution. * * * It may be difficult to draw the exact line between an office and a mere service or employment, but, as already observed, when public functions are conferred by law upon certain persons elected by the people or appointed by the legislature, if those functions concern the general interests of the State, and are not of a nature merely local or temporary, such persons are public officers, especially if they are paid a salary for their services out of the public treasury.

Mr. Henderson then takes up the case of In re Corliss (11 Rhode Island, 638), to which I shall refer at length a little later on; but I pause here to remark that in my judgment it is a direct and exact adjudication of the question that is now before us. I ask your especial attention, then, to the brief reference in the report to this case, as follows:

In re Corliss (11 R. I., 638) the question was up whether the office of a commissioner of the United States Centennial Commission is an office of trust under Article II, section 1, of the Constitution of the United States, and it was held that he was such an officer. The law creating that commission provided "for the holding of an exhibition of American and foreign arts, products, and manufactures, under the auspices of the Government of the United States," and the functions of such commissioners were to continue until the close of the exhibition, and their duties were "to prepare and superintend the execution of a plan for holding the exhibition." By the act of Congress approved June 1, 1872, the duties and functions of the commission were further increased and defined, and a corporation was created called "The Centennial Board of Finance," to cooperate with the commission and to raise and disburse the funds. It was to be organized under the direction of the commission. The commission was also to adopt plans for the erection of buildings, and the corporation created was to erect them in accordance with these plans.

The act also provided that the commission should "have power to control, change, or revoke all such grants, and shall appoint all judges and examiners and award all premiums." The commission was also "to supervise the closing up of the affairs of said corporation, to audit its accounts, and submit in a report to the President of the United States the financial results of the centennial exhibition." The act also provided "no compensation for services shall be paid to the commissioners or other officers provided by this act from the Treasury of the United States." The only other officers provided for by the act were alternates to serve as commissioners when the commissioners were unable to attend.

In the opinion in the case, the court gives especial consideration to the fact that the commissioners were paid no salaries, but holds that that is not a matter of consequence.

The court properly held that these commissioners were officers of the United States. They were certainly vested with sovereign functions of the Government which were to be exercised by them for the benefit of each and every State in the Union and for the benefit of all the people of the United States.

In Bunn v. The People (45 Ill., 397) the court held:

"A person employed for a special and single object, in whose employment there is no enduring element, nor designed to be, and whose duties when completed, although years may be required for their performance, ipso facto terminate the employment, is not an officer in the sense in which that term is used in the constitution of Illinois."

In re Attorneys, etc. (20 Johnson, N. Y.), the court defines the legal meaning of the term "office" to be "an employment on behalf of the Government in any station or public trust not merely transient, occasional, or incidental."

In matter of Hathaway (71 N. Y., 238-243) the court said:

"Public office" as used in the Constitution has respect to a permanent trust to be exercised in behalf of the Government, or of all citizens who may need the intervention of a public functionary or officer, and in all matters within the range of the duties pertaining to the character of the trust. It means a right to exercise generally and in all proper cases the functions of a public trust or employment."

In McArthur v. Nelson (81 Ky., 67) the question was up as to whether certain commissioners were district officers, and the case says:

"The first section of the act authorizes the judge of the circuit court to appoint three commissioners, residents of the district, who shall hold their office at the will and pleasure of the judge. It is made the duty of the commissioners to have the courthouse constructed at a cost not exceeding $50,000, and to enable them to raise this money they are authorized to issue bonds, with coupons attached, bearing interest at 5 per cent, payable semiannually; and to redeem the bonds and pay the interest they are further empowered to levy an annual tax on the real and personal property in the district not exceeding 12 cents on the $100, etc. * * * They are not district officers within the meaning of section 10 of article 6 of the constitution, but are the mere agents for the district, required by the act to discharge certain duties with reference to the building of the courthouse, and when those duties end their employment terminates."

In United States v. Germaine (99 U. S., 508) the question as to who are and who are not officers of the United States was quite fully considered. Under section 4777 of the Revised Statutes, United States, it is provided:

"That the Commissioner of Pensions be, and he is hereby, empowered to appoint, at his discretion, civil surgeons to make the periodical examinations of pensioners which are or may be required by law and to examine applicants for pensions where he shall deem an examination by a surgeon appointed by him necessary, and the fee for such examinations and the requisite certificates thereof in duplicate, including postage on such as are transmitted to pension agents, shall be $2, which shall be paid by the agent for paying pensions in the district within which the pensioner or claimant resides out of any money appropriated for the payment of pensions under such regulations as the Commissioner of Pensions may prescribe."

It was held in the case cited that the appointees under this statute are not officers of the United States but mere agents of the Commissioner of Pensions.

That completes the review of the authorities by Mr. Henderson; and then he argues as follows:

It is perfectly clear, therefore, that the commissioners appointed under the act approved July 7, 1898, "An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, and for prior years, and for other purposes," the resolution approved July 7, 1898 (Pub. Res. No. 51), entitled "Joint resolution to provide for annexing the Hawaiian Islands to the United States," and the act approved June 18, 1898, entitled "An act authorizing the appointment of a nonpartisan commission to collate information and to consider and recommend legislation to meet the problems presented by labor, agriculture, and capital," are not persons "holding any office under the United States."

Here is the gist of the argument:

They are persons designated by authority of Congress to make certain investigations, inquiries, etc., or to conduct certain negotiations preliminary to and as a basis for possible action by the Congress of the United States or by one branch of it. They neither make law, execute law affecting the rights of the people, nor perform judicial functions. These commissioners are and are intended to be mere advisory agents of the Congress of the United States. Their investigations are confined to some particular matter or subject, and they are not required to take an oath of office. They have no power to decide any question or bind the Government or do any act affecting the rights of a single individual citizen.

If the House or Senate authorizes or directs the Speaker or President of the Senate, as the case may be, to appoint a special committee to investigate some particular matter or subject and report and recommend legislation, can it be claimed that an office is created or that the Members of the House or Senate appointed hold "an office"? Suppose the President of the United States is authorized to make the appointments. Does this create offices, and are the appointees "officers"?

The acts performed are for the information of the Congress, and it alone. Their suggestions and recommendations have no force; they may or may not be adopted. To make their suggestions or recommendations operative, bills or resolutions must be introduced embodying the provisions recommended, or their substance, and these must be enacted into law. If a treaty is recommended by peace commissioners, it must be submitted to the Senate and by it ratified. The acts of such a commission do not bind the President, the Senate, or the Government. Then such commissioners neither make, execute, nor interpret law. They do not possess or exercise any of the sovereign power of the Government of the United States.

That the Senate may feel that it ought to ratify or approve the recommendations of such a commission can make no difference; the fact remains that their acts are not binding upon anyone or upon any departments of the Government.

If the Congress of the United States should see fit by joint resolution to authorize the President to appoint 10 persons as commissioners, whose duty it should be to investigate the condition of the people residing in Porto Rico and recommend laws suitable to their government, and should appropriate money to pay the expenses of the commission, would anyone contend that such commissioners when appointed would become other than mere agents of the Congress for the purposes specified? Would they possess or exercise legislative, executive, or judicial functions or powers? Such commissioners would possess the mere naked power to investigate and report, and their action would conclude no one, nor would they execute or interpret any law. Their action would not affect in the slightest degree the personal or property rights of a single citizen of the Republic. They would be answerable to no power for misconduct, they would be bound by no oath.

"The officer is distinguished from the employee," says Judge Cooley, "in the greater importance, dignity, and independence of his position; in being required to take an official oath, and perhaps to give an official bond; in the liability to be called to account as a public offender for misfeasance or nonfeasance in office, and usually, though not necessarily, in the tenure of his position."

Attorneys and counsellors admitted to practice in the courts of the United States are not officers of the United States. (Ex parte Garland, 4 Wall. (U. S.), 333; see also In re Robinson, 131 Mass., 376.)

In People v. Nichols (52 N. Y., 478), one of the judges of the court of appeals was designated by statute as one of three persons to examine and report upon the genuineness and value of certain relics which the State proposed to purchase, and upon the certificate of these commissioners the purchase price was to be paid. The court held that this was not an office or a public trust within the meaning of the constitution of that State, which prohibits such judge from holding an office or public trust. Said the court: "It is very plain that the doing of such an act, a single act like this, is not within the meaning of the constitutional prohibition against holding any other office or public trust" (p. 485).

Applying these principles to what is known as the Postal Commission the committee finds that those Members of the House of Representatives appointed or designated as commissioners under public act No. 131—"An act making appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899," are not, nor are any of them, officers under the United States within the meaning of the Constitution.

In respect to the Industrial Commission, the committee finds that those Members of the House of Representatives appointed or designated as commissioners under public act No. 146, "An act authorizing the appointment of a nonpartisan commission to collate information and consider and recommend legislation to meet the problems presented by labor, agriculture, and capital," approved July 7, 1898, are not, nor are any of them, officers under the United States within the meaning of the Constitution.

In respect to the Canadian Commission the committee finds that those Members of the House of Representatives appointed or designated as commissioners under public act No. 182—"An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, and prior years, and for other purposes"—are not, nor are any of them, officers under the United States within the meaning of the Constitution.

In respect to the Hawaiian Commission the committee finds that those Members of the House of Representatives appointed or designated as commissioners under public resolution No. 51—"Joint resolution providing for annexing the Hawaiian Islands to the United States"—are not, nor are any of them, officers under the United States within the meaning of the Constitution.

In respect to visitors to the Military Academy, etc., the committee finds that those Members of the House of Representatives appointed and designated as visitors to the Military Academy at West Point, to the Naval Academy at Annapolis, and the regents and directors and consulting trustees to the various public institutions in the District of Columbia and appointed by the Speaker of the House, are not, nor are any of them, officers under the United States within the meaning of the Constitution.

So upon that ground, and upon that ground alone, the House of Representatives held that the commissioners authorized by the acts referred to were not officers of the United States. The Senate apparently reached a different conclusion.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I feel like apologizing for interrupting the Senator, but I was not able to be here yesterday, and I did not hear the Senator's argument. It may be that the information I seek has therefore been given by the Senator, and if it has been, I hope the Senator will ignore my inquiry.

I have been very much interested to-day in the legal argument the Senator has been making. He has just finished a statement of the reasons upon which the House based its holding that in the cases mentioned the persons were not officers of the United States.

In the case to which the Senator has referred, which evidently the Senator debated yesterday, in which an argument was made by Senator Hoar before the Judiciary Committee, did they reach any different holding?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; they did.

Mr. NORRIS. Did they hold those persons to be officers whom the House had held were not officers?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I stated a while ago this morning, and stated yesterday, that, so far as I have been able to discover, the Judiciary Committee, to which the matter was referred by the Senate, made no report. A diligent search has revealed none. It is disclosed that upon the resolution to refer, or before the Committee on the Judiciary, or perhaps before the Senate in executive session, Senator Hoar made an address, which is frequently referred to in subsequent parts of the RECORD, but a diligent search has not revealed a report of the address. The Senate, however, refused to confirm the nominations of the Members of the Senate and House, apparently persuaded by the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. NORRIS. In listening to the citations which the Senator has just given, it seems to me that we would be compelled to distinguish between the kind of duties those persons performed and the ones which must be performed by the commissioners in the case at bar.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is the proposition for which I am contending; and not alone that, if I may say so to the Senator, but we must distinguish them also from appointments made by the President of commissioners to negotiate treaties. In the first place, the President has the undoubted power to appoint anyone whom he may see fit to appoint as his personal representative to negotiate treaties, a power reposed in him by the Constitution, and which it was not intended in every case, it least, that he should exercise personally. In a number of cases the President has seen fit to submit to the Senate for confirmation the names of the men designated by him for that duty. That practice prevailed quite generally prior to 1815. It then fell into disuse, but was again observed in the case of the appointment of commissioners to negotiate the treaty between this country and Great Britain following the Civil War.

Mr. NORRIS. As I understand it, the distinguishing feature in a case of that kind would be that said persons were not officers of the Government of the United States; they did not have any jurisdiction to perform any acts which would bind the Government or any of its agents, but they were, in fact, only agents making necessary investigations, which, before they could be effective or legal or binding on anybody, would require action on the part of the Senate, as well as the President, in the case of a treaty. In other words, it would be the same as the power of the House or the Senate to appoint Members from their own body to make the necessary investigation on which they expected to base legislation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly; and they performed exactly the same functions as a committee of the House.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; that was my idea.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Montana has, I think, conclusively established his position that the commissioners created under the act of Congress approved February 9, 1922, an act to create a commission authorized under certain conditions to refund or convert obligations of foreign Governments held by the United States of America, and for other purposes, constitute offices.

With the permission of the Senator from Montana, I would like to supplement the authorities he has already cited with some others, which in my opinion strengthen the position he has taken.

The following doctrine is laid down in State v. Hocker (22 Southern, 721):

The term "office" implies a delegation of a portion of the sovereign power to, and a possession of it by, the person filling the office.

Further:

An office is where, for the time being, a portion of the sovereignty, legislative, executive, or judicial, attaches, to be exercised for the public benefit.

That was the expression of the court in United States v. Lockwood (1 Pinney, 359), a Wisconsin report.

Mechem, on Public Offices, section 4, lays down the following doctrine:

The most important characteristic which distinguishes an office from an employment or contract—

And I understand the question involved in this controversy is whether this is an office or a mere employment:

The most important characteristic which distinguishes an office from an employment or contract is that the creation of an office involves a delegation to the individual of some of the sovereign functions of government, to be exercised by him for the benefit of the public. * * * Unless the powers conferred are of this nature, the individual is not a public officer.

In State v. Griswold (46 Atlantic), which may have been cited by the Senator from Montana, an office is defined as "a position to which certain duties are attached, a post, the possession of which imposes certain duties upon the possessor, and confers upon him authority for the performance."

In a number of authorities it is held that "within the ordinary acceptance of the term, one who is engaged to render service in a particular transaction is not an 'officer.' That word implies continuity of service, and excludes those employed for a special and a single transaction," as, for instance, commissioners appointed by circuit courts.

I take it that is the principle which the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] had in mind when he asked the Senator from Montana on yesterday a question concerning this subject; but the Senator from Montana, I believe, has already shown that that principle does not apply to this case.

In Second Spelling on Extraordinary Remedies the distinction is made perfectly clear, in my opinion. I quote:

There are three principal tests for determining whether one performing duties of a public nature is a public officer, in the sense of subjecting his incumbency or employment to a quo warranto proceeding: First, whether the sovereignty, either directly, as through legislative enactment or Executive appointment, or indirectly, as through a municipal charter, is the source of authority; second, whether the duties pertaining to the position are of a public character—that is, due to the community in its political capacity; third, whether the tenure is fixed and permanent for a definite period by law, unless for neglect of duty or malfeasance, or subject to termination at the will of others without assignment of cause.

Applying that test to this case, there can be no other conclusion reached than that these commissioners are officers, because it is clear that all three of these principles are embraced within definition of the powers and duties of the commissioners. The act expressly provides that they shall have power to adjust the foreign loans of the United States. It is provided by section 4 that "the authority granted by this act shall cease and determine at the end of three years from the date of the passage of this act." Every test laid down by Spelling in the section I have quoted as requisite to the existence of a public office is found in the statute creating these commissionerships. Clearly the duties of the commissioners are of a public nature, and the period of their service, their term of office, is fixed at three years.

It is regrettable that all Senators are not present to hear the argument of the Senator from Montana, because this subject is one of very great importance to the Senate and to the country.

The eligibility of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOR] and the Representative from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] to sit upon this commission must be determined by the Senate, and if the well-established rules of law governing the question are applied, the conclusion must be reached that these commissioners are officers within the meaning of the Constitution, and that both the Senator from Utah and the Representative from Ohio are ineligible to serve, under the plain provisions of the Constitution.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I thank the Senator from Arkansas for his contribution to the discussion, and for the citation of the authorities, which help in the solution of the problem before us.

Though the address of Senator Hoar on the resolution directing the inquiry by the Judiciary Committee touching the eligibility of Members of Congress appointed under the joint resolution authorizing the appointment of commissioners to investigate and report concerning legislation for the Hawaiian Islands has not been found, we have found a number of discussions referring to his address, and have a brief statement in connection with a later discussion of his views upon the subject, which I now submit for the consideration of the Senate.

I read from the RECORD, volume 33, part 4, Fifty-fifth Congress, first session, the proceedings of March 24, 1900, the matter under consideration being a resolution for the appointment of a commission by the President of the United States:

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, it has been difficult to find out just what is in the bill, owing to the confusion in the Chamber. I wish to ask the Senator who has it in charge if it contemplates the appointment of citizens, eminent citizens, outside of Members of the House and Senators?
